London; graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1819; was admitted to the bar in 1825, and afterwards took orders and held a curacy in the Anglican Church, but resigned his charge in 1827 to join a new sect called "the Brethren," afterwards known as the "Plymouth Brethren," from the association of many of their number with Plymouth, where they had a meeting house. In 1838 he went to Switzerland, and established congregations in the cantons of Vaud, Geneva, and Berne, some of which suffered persecution in 1845 in a revolution aroused by Jesuit intrigues. Darby escaped and returned to Plymouth. He had already been accused of departing from the first principles of "the Brethren," and after his return a division took place, and he founded a new association, known as "the Daibyites." He paid several visits to Canada and to the United States, and also visited New Zealand and the West Indies. His writings were published partly under his own name, partly anonymously or under his initials. He made French and German translations of the New Testament, and wrote a number of hymns. Darwin, Charles Robert, F.R.S., F.G.S., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1809-1882, b. at "The Mount," Shrewsbury, Eng., son of Robert Waring Darwin, M.D., F.R.S., and of Susanna, daughter of Josiah Wedgwood, and grandson of Erasmus Darwin, (q. v., ante, vol. i.) After studying at Shrewsbury Grammar-School, he entered Edinburgh University in 1825, with a view to adopting his father's profession; but the study of medicine proving his father's profession; but the study of medicine proving distasteful to him, he abandoned it after two years, and entered Christ's College, Cambridge, with the design of fitting himself for the church. The influence of Professor Henslow, whose lectures he attended, aroused an interest in science which soon became dominant, and shortly after taking his B.A. degree, in 1831, he was en-gaged as naturalist to the "Bengle," then starting under Captain—afterwards Admiral—Fitzroy to complete the survey of l'atagonia begun by Captain King in 1826-30, and to make further surveys in South America and the Pacific. In 1836 he returned to England, and was occupied for some time in the preparation of works embodying some of the results of the expedition. In 1839 he married his cousin, Emma Wedgwood, and in 1842 settled at Down, Kent, where he spent the remainder of his life, engaged in researches and experiments designed to test and establish the theory of evolution which has become identified with his name. His study of the South American fossils had first led him to doubt the commonlyreceived view of the different species of animals and plants as distinct and immutable types, the product of direct and successive acts of creation. But before seeking to displace this doctrine by that of a slow and continuous development through regular and ordinary processes of nature, he desired to trace so far as possible the whole course of derivation, and to illustrate his argument by an abundance of minute details. He accordingly looked forward to the production of a single elaborate work, covering the whole field of his argument. But, finding that he was about to be anticipated by Mr. Alfred Wallace, who had arrived independently at the same general conclusions, he first drew up a paper, which was read, with that of Wallace, at a meeting of the Linnman Society, July 1, 1858, and then set to work to prepare an "abstract" of his theory, which grew into a volume, and was published in November, 1859. This was The Origin of Species, which excited a discussion that partook of the character of a theological controversy. The adverse criticism was, however, much more sweeping and vehe-ment than the defence. Men of science were not generally prepared to accept the new theory in its entirety, and those most favorably disposed to it either shrunk from the open expression of their approval or were content to claim for it a respectful hearing and to deprecate the notion of its destructive influence on religious belief. Yet there could be little doubt as to the general drift of scientific opinions. In March, 1860, Darwin drew up a classified list of his adherents, including among geologists Lyell and Ramsay, among zoologists Huxley and Lubbock, among botanists Hooker and Asa Gray, (to some extent,) among physiologists Dr. W. B. Carpenter, and (to a large extent) Sir Henry Holland. He added that should the book be forgotten "with such a list, I am convinced the subject will not." Darwin's subsequent works may be regarded as amplifications of different sections of The Origin of Species. The Descent of Man presented the most unpalatable portions of the doctrine, but the shock was less than had been anticipated, the attitude of the public towards evolution having considerably changed in the years between 1859 and 1871. In the interval that has since clapsed the theory of evolution has been subjected to more careful criticism in regard to details, but in the main it has formed the basis of all recent scientific investigation. During his later years Darwin devoted himself chiefly to the study of plants and to works embodying the results of extensive experimental rescarches. He led a quiet, seeluded life, partly on account of chronic ill health, and his absorption in his work was such that he appears to have sacrineed to it not only extraneous interests and occupations, but to some extent his natural tastes, his sense of religion, his love of literature and of art. He was distinion, his love of literature and of art. He was distinguished by his modesty, his simplicity of mind, and his kindness and helpfulness to younger naturalists. He died at Down on April 19, 1882, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. For biog., see Darwin, Francis, m/ra; also, Allen, C. B. G., and Bettany, G. T., supra, and a volume of Memorial Notices, by T. H. Huxley, J. G. Romanes, A. Geikie, and W. T. T. Dyer, issued in 1882. The literature of "Darwinism" would form a library in itself including works in many foreign languages. in itself, including works in many foreign languages, especially German, the influence of evolution on the general tone of philosophical thought and investigation seeming to have been greater in Germany than in any other country. The following list of Darwin's works, additional to the few mentioned ante, vol. i, does not include his contributions to scientific journals, unless reprinted, which are enumerated in the biography by his son. The critical extracts give, necessarily, only a meagre idea of the controversy that followed the publication of his principal works, the articles from which they are derived being mainly occupied with a discussion of details. 1. the latter year having reached 11,000 copies; in 1882 it had extended to 26,000.)

"The essay is full of Mr. Darwin's characteristic excellences. It is a most readable book; full of facts in natural history, old and new, of his collecting and observing; and all of these are told in his own perspicuous language, and all thrown into picturesque combinations, and all sparkle with the colours of fancy and the lights of imagination. It assumes, too, the grave proportions of a sustained argument upon a matter of the deepest interest, not to naturalists alone, or even to men of science exclusively, but to every one who is interested in the history of man and of the relations of nature around him to the history and plan of creation. . . On what, then, is the new theory based? We say it with unfeigned regret in dealing with such a man as Mr. Darwin, on the merest hypotheses, supported by the most unbounded assumptions. — Quarterly Revew, 108, 225 et seq (This article was by Bishop Wilberforce). "Darwin's theory is an ingenious and plausible speculation, to which future physiologists will look back with the kind of admiration we bestow on the atoms of Lucretius or the crystal spheres of Eudoxus, containing, like these, some faint half-truth, marking at once the ignorance of the age and the ability of the philosopher."—North Brutish Review, xlvi. 171.

"It is a book-Review, xlvi. 171.

"It is a book—we say it deliberately—that will not bear to be dealt with lightly. It is the result of long-continued thought and labour, directed by a man of remarkable ability and wide attainments, to construct and consolidate a theory which has for its basis some undennable facts. There is scarcely an objection that can be urged that Mr. Darwin has not already anticipated, and to which he has not replied, so far as it admits of reply,—and that with a degree of moderation and candour that would be evidences of excellent judgment if they were not, as we believe them to be, entirely unaffected. ... So much we have said in bare justice to the author of this new theory; but it may relieve the auxiety of some of our readers if we at once declare that, after the most deliberate consideration of his argument, we remain unconvinced "—Sul. Rev., viii. 75 once declare that, after the most deliberate consideration of his argument, we remain unconvinced "—Sat. Rev., vni. 775

"Mr Darwin abhors mere speculation as Nature abhors a vacuum He is as greedy of cases and precedents as any constitutional lawver, and all the principles he lays down are capable of being brought to the test of observation and experiment. The path he bids us follow professes to be not a mere arry track, fabricated of ideal cobwebs, but a solid and broad bridge of facts. If it beso, it will carry us safely over many a chasm in our knowledge, and lead us to a region free from the snares of those fascinating but barren virgins, the Final Causes, against whom a high au thority has so justly warned us "—T H Huxley: article in the Times of December 26, 1859, quoted in the Life of Darwin, Amer ed. ii 49

"We are disposed to rank the derivative hypothesis in its fulness with the nebular hypothesis, and to regard both as allowable, as not unlikely to prove tenable in spite of some strong objections, but as not herefore demonstrably true. Those, if any there be, who regard the derivative hypothesis as satisfactorily proved, must have loose notions as to what proof is. Those who imagine it can be easily refuted and cast aside must, we think, have very imperfect or very prejudiced conceptions of the facts concerned and of the questions at issue "—Asa Gray: Darwinnama, 135. (The article from which the extract is taken is one of three originally published in the Allantic Monthly for July, August, and October, 1860, and reprinted, at Darwin's request, in London, in 1861)

(in which the word "On" is omitted from the title,) 1877.

"The mass of detail here accumulated round a single subject strikingly illustrates the inexhaustible nature of biological research, and the laborious patience with which Mr Darwin lays his foundations. The net result is that some six thousand species of Orchids are absolutely dependent upon the agency of insects for their fertilization. That is to say, were these plants unvisited by insects, they would all rapidly disappear... Mr Darwin adds a valuable chapter on the Homologies of Orchids."—Sat. Rev., XIV. 486.

"Readers of this fascinating treatise will learn, first of all, that the sun has no influence over such movements directly, and that its indirect influence is commonly adverse or disturbing, except the heat, which quickens vegetable as it does animal life. Also, that climbing is accomplished by powers and actions as unlike those generally predicated of the vegetable kingdom as any which have been brought to view in the preceding volume," ["Insectivorous Plants."]—Asa Gray: Derwintana, 336, (reprinted from the Nation, January 18, 1878.)

"Never. perhaps, in the history of philosophy, have such wide generalizations been derived from such a small basis of fact. Mr. Darwin's theory of the growth of the moral sense and of the intellectual faculty is unsupported by any proof; and the very corner-stone of the hypothesis, that the human mind is identical in kind with that of the brutes, is a mere assumption, opposed alike to experience and philosophy."—Edin Rev., cxxxiv. 99.

"The effect of Mr. Darwin's long-expected and lately-published volames will not be so much to startle friend or foe by novel facts or transcendent theories as to consolidate, to fortify, and to push to a conclusion the scheme of ideas which the world has learned for years to associate with his name. .. His conclusions now go the length which he had, in terms somewhat vague and tentative, set himself at the outset of his speculations. He claims to have brought man himself, his origin and constitution, within that unity which he had previously sought to trace through all lower animal forms. The growth of opinion in the interval, due in chief measure to his own intermediate works, has placed the discussion of this problem very much in advance of that held by it fifteen years ago. ... Mr. Darwin's object in the present work is to establish, from a general survey of his whole nature, the evidences of man, like every other species, being descended from some pre existing form; secondly, the manner of his development; and, thirdly, the value of the differences between the so-called races of man,'... The intellectual pleasure of following so exquisite a chain of philosophical deduction may almost compensate many minds for the shock which his ultimate conclusion will inflict on them."

"His leading idea is that of tracing the law of Evolution as displayed in, or accounting for, Expression or the play of features and gestures in man and animals,—the inarticulate language, as it has been called, of the emotions.

As a kind of supplement or paregon to his more profound or systematic studies, as well as containing inexhaustible matter of novel suggestion and curious thought, this little work will be found well worthy of the writer's name."—Sad Rev., xxxiv.633.

"Before the experiments made by Mr. Darwin, no such power as that of true digestion was known to exist in the vegetable kingdom."—Sad. Rev., xl 304.

"Mr. Darwin's book may be held up as a model of what a treatise should be that is addressed to intelligent readers, a majority of whom, it is to be presumed, have no special acquaintance with the matter under consideration.

Fact is added to fact, inference to interence, till at length the body of evidence, direct and indirect, becomes so overwhelming that there is as little chance of controvering Mr. Darwin's conclusions as there is for a fly to escape when once it has been caught in the cruel embrace of a sundew "—Ath., No. 2490.

"In respect of the great problems of Philosophy, the ings, and the action of worms in the demonstron of the land."—4th, No., 2816.

General Criticism:

"In respect of the great problems of Philosophy, the post-Darwinian generation is, in one sense, exactly where the pre-Darwinian generations were. They remain insoluble. But the present generation has the advantage of being better provided with the means of freeing itself from the tyranny of certain sham solutions. The known is finite, the unknown infinite; intellectually we stand on an islet in the midst of an illimitable ocean of inexplicability. Our business in every generation is to reclaim a little more land, to add something to the extent and solidity of our possessions. And even a cursory glance at the history of the biological sciences during the last quarter of a century is sufficient to justify the assertion that the most potent instrument for the extension of the realm of natural knowledge which has come into men's hands, since the publication of Newton's 'Principia,' is Darwin's 'Origin of Species' "—T. H. Huxley: On the Reception of the "Origin of Species." Torming chap, xiv. of the Life of Darwin.

"The few general facts out of which the theory of evolution by natural selection is formed—viz, struggle for existence, survival of the fittest, and heredity—were all previously well-known facts; and we may not unreasonably feel astonished that so apparently obvious a combination of them as that which occurred to Mr Darwin should have occurred to no one else, with the single exception of Mr. Wallace.

But the greatness of Mr. Darwin should have occurred to no one else, with the single exception of the reformer of biology is not to be estimated by the fact that he conceived the idea of natural selection: his claim to everlasting memory rests upon the many years of devoted labour whereby he tested this idea in all conceivable ways,—amassing facts from every department of science, balancing evidence with the soundest judgment, shirking no difficulty, and at last astonishing the world as with a revelation by p in the last ten years will bear me out to the full when I assert that there is no field of biological inquiry in which the influence of the 'Origin of Species' is not traceable; the foremost men of science are either avowed champions assert that there is no field of biological inquiry in which the influence of the 'Origin of Species' is not traceable; the foremost men of science are either avowed champions of its leading doctrines, or at any rate abstain from opposing them; a host of young and ardent investigators seek for and find inspiration and guidance in Mr. Darwin's great work; and the general doctrine of Evolution, to one side of which it gives expression, finds in the phenomena of biology a firm base of operations whence it may conduct its conquest of the whole realm of nature. History warns us, however, that it is the customary fate of new truths to begin as heresles and to end as superstitions; and, as matters now stand, it is hardly rash to anticipate that in another twenty years the new generation, educated under the influences of the present day, will be in danger of accepting the main doctrines of the 'Origin of Species' with as little reflection, and, it may be, with as little justification, asso many of our contemporaries, twenty years ago, rejected them "—T. H. Huxley: Nature, xxii. 1. "Darwinian teleology has the special advantage of accounting for the imperfections and failures as well as for successes. It not only accounts for them, but turns them to practical account. It explains the seeming waste as being part and parcel of a great economical process. Without this, no natural selection and survival of the fittest, no continuous adaptation to changing surroundings, no diversification and improvement, leading from lower up to higher and nobler forms. So the most puzzling things of all to the old-school teleologists are the principla of the Darwinian."—Ass Gray: Darwiniana, 378.

"Mr. Darwin's investigation presents us with a creative force, constantly, and apparently to human eyes tentatively, producing all possible variations in the specific living iorms of every kind which it has brought into existence, with a view, as it were, to see whether any of them will have the advantage over others,—creating very high forms of dom, conscience, the power to sin. Is this in any sense whatever, even conceivably, an atheistic philosophy? For our own part, we find Mr. Darwin's investigation of the origin of man a far more wonderful vindication of Theism than Paley's 'Natural Theology.'"—Spectator, xliv.

"These lectures, regarded simply from a literary point of view, are singularly bright and graceful, incisive in criticism, easy and flexible, famillar yet dignified, in style, full of suggestive matter suggestively presented, and everywhere lighted up with a fine moral sincerity and enthusiasm for the higher ideals and nobler personalities of the faith described. . . Where he is most the critical scholar, he never forgets that he is handling a religion; where he is most earnest as the interpreter of a religion, he never ceases to be critical and scholarly."—A. M. "The book Mr. Davis has written is not the book which real students of history would have asked him to write. They would like to have him tell the things which he knows better than other men, and of which his personal reminiscences will be original and valuable evidence... Mr. Davis in his two bulky volumes throws hardly a single ray of light upon the real secrets of the great conflict."—Nation, XXIII. 10.

"The work of Mr. Jefferson Davis will disappoint some readers and weary others." Those who turn to his volumes.

"The work of Mr. Jefferson Davis will disappoint some readers and weary others. Those who turn to his volumes for revelations will find that he has little that is new to tell, while those who hope to get from him a concise and clear view of the organization of which he was the soul and the chief will be repelled by the vast amount of dissertation with which he cumbers his pages. . . His work may not vindicate him from the charge of blundering or folly; it will not raise him in the opinion of his fellow-citizens in the North: but every impartial reader must recognize the ability with which it is composed, the sincerity with which his opinions are held and the good faith with which they are set forth, and the value which it possesses as the authentic commentary on the most momentous episode in the history of the United States."—Ath., No. 2799.

"Mrs. Davis's stories are habitually spoken of as 'earnest' works. . . Their pretensions are something very different from those of the simple novel of entertainment, of character, and of incident. The writer takes life desperately hard, and looks upon the world with a sentimental—wee may even say, a tearful—eye. The other novel—the objective novel, as we may call it for convenience—appeals to the reader's sense of beauty, his idea of form and proportion, his humanity in the broadest sense. Mrs. Davis's tales and those of her school appeal, we may say, to the conscience, to the sense of right and sense. Mrs. Davis's tales and those of her school appeal, we may say, to the conscience, to the sense of right and wrong, to the instincts of charity and patronage. She aims at instructing us, purifying us, stirring up our pity. Writers of the other school content themselves with exciting our curiosity."—Nation, vii. 330.

Dawkins, William Boyd, F.R.S., F.G.S., b. 1838, at Welshpool, Montgomeryshire, Wales; was educated at Jesus College, Oxford, where he was the first holder of a geological scholarship founded by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and graduated 1860. He was Britain in 1867, and in 1874 became professor of geology in Owens College, Manchester. In 1882 he was one of the committee of scientific men appointed to inquire into the scheme of the Channel Tunnel, and was intrusted with the geological survey of the French and English coasts. He has contributed numerous papers to the Proceedings of the Geological, Anthropological, and Royal Societies, relating chiefly to fossil mammalia, and is best Societies, relating chient to tossil mammalia, and is seek known by his researches on the remains discovered in caves in the south of France. He visited the United States in 1880, and lectured before the Lowell Institute in Boston. 1. Cave-Hunting: Researches on the Evidences of Caves respecting the Early Inhabitants of Europe. Illustrated by Coloured Plates and Wood-Cuts.

"Mr. Dawkins divides his subject under two heads, Physical and Biological: the first treating of the relation of caves to general physical geography, especially to that of the calcareous strata; the second, of their animal contents."—Ath., No. 2458.

"No one has gone more thoroughly than Professor Dawkins into the evidence as to the succession of animal life in England since the Miocene period, and the bearing of this evidence on the antiquity of man. . . . He is less disposed than most cave-hunters to worship their special idois of the cave." But when he comes out into the open, and takes to looking ethnologically at the people of the land, he is somewhat apt to set up 'idois of the tribe' and pay them reverence."—Spectator, xivii. 1568.

2. Early Man in Britain, and his Place in the Tertiary Period. Illust. Lon., 1880, 8vo.

"Professor Boyd Dawkins has sought to bring to a common focus the rays of light shed upon the primeval stage of human life by the sciences of geology, prehistoric archeology, and history . . With the materials thus accumulated the archeologist may claim to have established, as our author does in his preliminary remote past in which nan stands in the geological foreground down to the borders of written history."—Sat. Rev., xiix. 827.

"The weight of learning in its pages is by no means oppressive, since it is relieved by a pleasant style of writing, not common, it is sad to say, in works on solid science."—Ath., No. 2739.

"Mr. Dawson is careful to disclaim literary pretensions for his work, which the reader will feel has been a labour of real love. . . Mr. Dawson states that he was moved to undertake his task by the conviction that only one who knew not merely the events of Hannington's career, but the man himself,—who was familiar with the springs of his inner nature,—was qualified to tell the story of his life. . . . Dawson, Sir John William, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., C.M.G., b. 1820, at Pictou, Nova Scotia; was educated in the University of Edinburgh, and returning to Nova Scotia devoted himself to the study of its geology and natural history, and accompanied Sir Charles Lyell in his explorations there in 1842 and in 1852. In 1855 he became principal of McGill University, Montreal. In 1882 he received the Lyell medal of the Geological Society for eminent geological discoveries. He was knighted in 1884. In 1885 he presided at the meeting of the British Association at Birmingham. 1. Portions of the Neighbouring Provinces of British America, Edin., 1855, 8vo; supplementary chapter, 1860; 2d ed., rev. and enl., Lon., 1868.

"What Sir Roderick Murchison's well-known labours did a generation back for the Silurian system of Western Britain the careful work of Dr. J. W. Dawson may be said to have done for the geological structure and remains of the maritime Provinces of British North America... Besides its bearing upon theoretical or general geology, the work has a high local and economical value in regard to the mineral and other sources of wealth with which the Acadian soil is essentially rich."—Sat. Rev., xxvi. 64.

Condition of Prehistoric Men in Europe by those of the American Races, Lon., 1880, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1883.

"It is the object of Sir W. Dawson's book to exhibit the culture of the native American as it existed in præ-Columbian days, and by means of it to throw light upon the habits and institutions of Palæolithic man, as he lived in Hoxne or the valleys of the Somme. . . He lays down as an established starting-point the Hebrew tradition of our first parents, applies to it the Usherian chronology of B c. 4000, cites Tubal-Cain as the pioneer of the Iron Age, Jubal of the nomadic life, sees in Adam a Turanian man, in the big tenants of the Cro-mageron cave the giants of Genesis. . . We had thought that the school of Reconcilists was extinct, but, living in a land of survivals, Sir W. Dawson has galvanized it into unexpected life."—Spectator, lix. 1276.

"Mr. De Forest has many of the necessary qualifications of a good novelist. His plots are always interesting, and the reader is carried on to the end of the book in a pleasing uncertainty between a profound conviction of a happy issue and alarm at the dangers that encompass the tortured hero and heroine. His characters are sharply and humorously drawn, and, if they often lack those higher qualities that make people interesting in stories and in real life, they have certainly the merit of distinctivess. They make an impression as of people whom we have seen They stand out well. The scenes, too, that he represents are put before us with considerable dramatic vigor. His style is never dull, and the little side remarks . . . are often quite amusing."—Nation, xiv. 189.

"In 'John Ward, Preacher,' the author has given a picture of that rara avis, a logical Calvinist... John Ward's concerns, however, are not the only, perhaps not the main, interest of the book. The village of Ashurst supplies some charming scenes of country life, drawn with the tender grace and quaintiess in which the poet of 'The Old Garden' dipped an earlier pen... About the village sand rivalries and incompleted lives of Ashurst, hangs an old-time fragrance, as of a grandmother's rose-jar; but only a modern novelist (or a Greek poet) could have stated and left unsolved so many questions touching on tragedy."—Nation, xivi. 530.

"There is a wonderful harmony in the book. The tide of Carnival flows ceaselessly through it, with the booming music, the swift, fantastic, whirling rush, of the opening chapter. Images press, associations swarm, sounds are tumultuous, there are dash and glitter everywhere, and one is fairly smothered in flowers and synonymes, bewildered by the strange mixture of good and bad taste, of keen delicate definition of beauty and vulgar daubing, the piling-up of epithets, the attractiveness of some and the repulsiveness of other sentiments, the inveterately false art which first describes a beautiful object beautifully and then spoils the effect by likening it to something else."—

"Ouida's new story is perhaps the best of her many and meritorious works. It is in one volume, which is much, meritorious works. It is in one volume, which is much, and the style is comparatively subdued... The virtue of her amazingly virtuous peasants is kept in the background, her scenery is less lush, less overgrown with vlolets, maldenhair, rhododendrons, and so on, than usual, and, in short her style is decidedly chastened. Unfortunately, her theme is not so very chaste."-A. Lang: Acad., ix 428.

Lon., 1882, p. 8vo.

"The book now to be considered makes her genius apparent in the powerful and pathetic story which she tells of an Italian girl, possessed of great beauty and a strength that is marvellous, who takes up her abode alone in an old. Erruscan tomb, on a wild moorland; here she subsists almost entirely upon roots, berries, and bread which she makes for herself out of wild oats, exists in a Robinson-Crusoe-like sort of fashion, and has strange adventures. Her character, way of life, and herculean strength appear all pretty equally improbable; but the reader is too much interested to take exception to that, and it no more interferes with his enjoyment than the knowledge of the non-existence of fairies, gnomes, and elves spoils the pleasure existence of fairies, gnomes, and clves spoils the pleasure of a child deep in some of Hans Andersen's creations."—

Budget of Paradoxes, Lon., 1872, 8vo.

"Mr. De Morgan's 'paradoxers' are people who propound notions which deviate more or less widely from the accepted notions on any subject. Every one comes across such an inventor occasionally, but few people are aware how very large a class these rational monomaniacs form. It was a happy thought to put them together, and thus enable those who have been puzzled by one or two discoverers to see how they look in the lump. The result is a book of which to say that it is full of the most curious oddities, most amusingly told, is to give a scant description of it. It is one of those rare books in which wit, learning, and scholarship are blended into a charming medley, each page containing a new surprise."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 638.

Denison, Ven. George Anthony, [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. 1805, at Ossington, Nottinghamshire, Eng.; brother of the late J. Evelyn Denison, Viscount Ossington, and of the late Edward Denison, D.D., Bishop of Sulisbury, (q. v., ante, vol. i.) He was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated with honors in classics in 1826; was elected Fellow of Oriel College in 1828; became curate of Cuddesdon, Oxfordshire, in 1832, vicar of Broadwinsor, Dorset, in 1838, and vicar of East Brent, Somerset, in 1845. On his presentation to the latter vicarage he was made examining chaplain to the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who in 1851 advanced him to the arch-deaconry of Taunton. He resigned his chaplaincy in 1853 on account of a charge of unsound doctrine which was made, and preached as his defence three sermons on "The Real Presence," which led to his being deprived for a time of his ecclesiastical preferments by judgment of a court presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The judgment was set aside by the judicial committee of the Privy Council in 1858. The following is a selection from the list of his numerous publications, which are chiefly addresses, letters, single sermons, charges, &c. 1. "As Mr. E. Whymper's 'Scrambles' was the story of the conquest of the Matterhorn, Mr. C. Dent's 'Above the Snow-Line' is the story of the conquest of the Aiguille du Dru.... The book contains a lively record of a most audacious struggle against nature, much sound reflection on all matters of mountain-craft, and a series of most amusing sketches of certain recently developed types of the climbing fraternity."—Douglas W. "Something new has turned up in the wonderful spiritualist world. It is called Psychometry, and means a certain power possessed by people who are termed psychometers, which enables them, when any piece of matter is placed in contact with them, to see all that has ever happened to that piece of matter. . . So far as is yet known, almost all psychometers are American ladies. The greatest are Mrs. Denton, wife of Mr. Denton, a lecturer on geology at Boston, U.S.; Mrs. Cridge, of Pennsylvania; and Mrs. Lucielle Do Viel, of Pulneyville, Wayne Co., N.Y.,—'a lady who, on examining a specimen psychometrically, not only goes to the spot from which the specimen was obtained, but has the sensation of travelling while doing so,' and who may possibly have had this gift allotted to her by the kindness of nature as some compensation for her extraordinary name.'—Sal. "Mr. Devas has gathered together a great deal of interesting information on the various constitutions of the home at different times among the white and yellow races of mankind.... While he undoubtedly possesses many qualifications for the historical investigation of this important subject, he has preferred to treat it in a dogmatic rather than a strictly scientific spirit: he uses history to illustrate and enforce the Christian doctrine of family relationship."—Historical Review, No. 6.

"If his writing is not marked by that unity of purpose, by that desire of the critic to keep his eye always on the object, and to concentrate his analysis, which is to be found in the school of literary criticism which looks to France for its method, but prefers to lead the reader by more labyrinthine paths to the full appreciation of some poet's beauties, it is none the less pleasant and delightful.

of her Memory, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"If one tithe of the statements contained in this volume are true, Lady Lytton was for years the victim of cruel and persistent persecution. Many of the details must be regarded as proved beyond dispute. As a wrife she was deeply wronged; but even the bitterest provocation will not suffice to excuse the course of conduct which she pursued. . . In her vindication of her heroine Miss Devey has overshot the mark. She relies implicitly on Lady Lytton's own evidence, as given in her diarles, letters, or an autobiographical and unpublished MS. called 'Nemesis.' No impartial person can fail to see that much of this evidence is extremely high-coloured "—Ath., No 8108.

Dickens, Charles, [ante, vol. i, add.,] 1812-1870, "entered in the baptismal register of Portsea as Charles John Huffham, though on the very rare occasions when he subscribed that name he wrote Huffam.") In the year 1858, to which the latest entries in vol. i. belong, Dickens began the course of public readings from his works, which was continued at intervals, during the twelve remaining years of his life, in London and the provinces, and in 1867-68 in many of the principal towns of the United States. In the same year he separated from his wife, and took steps for severing his connection with Household Words, which in the following year was discontinued, and followed by the establishment of All the Year Round. In 1860 he sold his residence in London, "Tavistock House," and established his permanent residence at Gadshill. His incessant labors and multifarious activity are supposed to have hastened his death, which occurred very suddenly, though not without premonitory symptoms throughout all his late years. popularity as a writer seems to have suffered no diminution, at least in the twelve years succeeding his death, during which period the sale of his works in England amounted to 4,239,000 volumes. "It would, of course, be against all experience to suppose that to future generations Dickens, as a writer, will be all that he was to his own. Much that constitutes the subject, or at least furnishes the background, of his pictures of English life, . . . has vanished, or is being improved off the face of the land. The form, again, of Dickens's principal works may become obsolete, as it was in a sense accidental. He was the most popular novelist of his day; but should prose fiction, or even the full and florid species of it which has enjoyed so long-lived a favour, ever be out of season, the popularity of Dickens's books must experience an inevitable diminution. . . Nature, when she gifted Dickens with sensibility, observation, and imagination, had bestowed upon him yet another boon in the quality which seems more prominent than any other in his whole being. The vigour of Dickens—a mental and moral vigour supported by a splendid physical organism—was the parent of some of his foibles; amongst the rest, of his tendency to exaggeration. . . But without this vigour he could not have been creative as he was; and in him there were accordingly united with rare completeness a swift responsiveness to the impulses of humour and pathos, an inexhaustible fertility in discovering and inventing materials for their exercise, and the constant creative desire to give to these newly-created materials a vivid plastic form,"—A. D. Ward: Dickens, (English Men of Letters,) 194, 202.

wall that is strange, diversified, alluring, and uncomfortable in the life of an actor is illustrated in the career of Charles Mathews. . . Mr. Dickens has discharged competently and gracefully his task of editor. So little obtrusion of self is there, it is only in the short prefatory explanation that we hear of him or recognize his existence. . . The papers with which he deals had been arranged by Mathews himself."—Ath., No. 2697.

Dilke, Sir Charles Wentworth, Bart., LL.B., . 1843, in London; son of the late Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, and grandson of Charles Wentworth Dilke, supra. He graduated as head of the Law Tripos at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1866; was called to the bar at the Middle Temple 1866; elected M.P. for the borough of Chelsea 1868, and re-elected 1874; was appointed under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1880; became president of the local government board, with a seat in the cabinet, 1882. In 1885-86 his name was before the public in connection with the divorce case of Crawford v. Crawford, and in 1886 he lost his seat in Parliament and retired from public life. 1. 8th ed., with additional chapters on English Influence in Japan and Chins. &c., 1885, 1 vol. p. 8vo.

"The defects of Mr. Dilke's work are a certain excess of statement, a considerable crudity of opinion as to the principles which govern the formation of societies, some of the pedantry of travel, and somewhat too much readiness to believe in the grandeur of England because you meet English squatters in Australia and English-speaking barbarians in Nevada or Colorado. Its merits are that it is written in a lively and agreeable style, that it implies a great deal of physical pluck, that no page of it falls to show an acute and highly intelligent observer, that it stimulates the imagination as well as the judgment of the reader, and that it is on perhaps the most interesting subject that can attract an Englishman who cares about his country."—Sat. The Present Position of European Politics; or, Europe in 1887, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"The first sentence of the first essay in this reprint from the 'Formightly Review' runs as follows: 'The present position of the European world is one in which sheer force holds a larger place than it has held in modern times since the fall of Napoleon.' The words constitute the keynote of the writer's inquiry into the present state of Europe and the means which the different countries possess of enforcing their views and aspirations by the sword."—Ath., No. 3130. "Provided with a mass of information and professional opinion, he supports his statements of military weakness with facts the truth of which cannot be gainsaid. When, however, he comes to remedies, his lack of professional training leads him, in our opinion, occasionally into error.

Sir Charles Dilke would have two armies,—a long-service one for India and the East, and a short-service one for duty at home and in the Mediterranean. . . A most valuable, practical, and pregnant book. If it does nothing else, it will instruct the public and give the authorities cause for reflection."—Ath., No. 8162.

Disraeli, Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield, [ante, vol. i., add ,] 1804-1881. In February, 1858, Mr Disraeli became chancellor of the exchequer for the second time, resigning with the rest of the ministry in June, 1859, and remaining in opposition till July, 1866, when the third Derby administration was formed, Disraeli again becoming chancellor of the exchequer, and in February, 1868, succeeding Lord Derby as premier. On the defeat of the government in the general election of that year he resigned office, in December, without waiting for Parliament to assemble. In February, 1874, his party returned to power with an immense Parliamentary majority, and its six years' tenure of office, with Disraeli at its head, was distinguished by a bolder and more active foreign policy than that of any former administration for a long period, leading to the treaty of Berlin, 1878, and a new invasion of Afghanistan, and exciting a strong agitation and conflict of opinion at home, the final result being the overthrow of the government in April, 1880, when the prime minister retired from office with the title of Earl of Beaconsfield, and his political career, one of the most extraordinary in English history, came to an end. 1. "The controversial part of the book is subordinate to the decorative effects in which Mr Disraeli delights as heartily as when Lord Codlingsby, five-and-twenty years ago, visited Rafael Mendoza at his sumptuous palace in Holywell Street. The true precursor of the author of 'Lothair' was the biographer of Aladdin. . . There is always something attractive in the preservation through maturity of the innocent tastes of early life; and it is pleasant to find that Mr. Disraell still cherishes the ducal illusions which fuscinated his youth."—Sat. "The book is readable from end to end, more so, we think, than any book of American travel that has been written for a good many years... The accounts of all his strange acquaintances, the free-lovers of Oneida, the Shaker monks and nuns, the Tunker celibates, are equally full of interest and information... We might transfer half his pages to our columns and not exhaust his store of what in our opinion is extremely readable writing."—Nation, iv. 165.

"The book is not a novel; it is not a topographical or architectural book; it is not a history in any intelligible sense of the word. It is simply a book in which the Tower of Loudon is made into a peg on which to hang a great deal of sketchy writing about various people, mainly people who had to do with the Tower by being prisoners therein."—Scil. "He seems really to have looked with some care into the state of education in Switzerland.... To be sure, the subject is brought in and sent out with a flourish; but, if we may liken Mr. Dixon's arrangement to a sandwich, he gives us a good thick slice of solid meat in the middle."

"Mr. Dixon is, we venture to think, better as a traveller than as an historian. . . . He is more at home in painting an Indian squaw or a Mormon wife than in drawing the portraits of Anne Boleyn or Katherine of Aragon. . . . He interviewed' President Grant, General Sheridan, and a good many other people; and perhaps they have no right to complain that his comments on their characters and personal appearance are as outspoken and minute as anything that a Yankee 'special' has written about European men of mark."—Ath., No. 2506.

Dobson, Henry Austin, b. 1840, at Plymouth, Eng.; son of George Clarisse Dobson, a civil engineer; was intended for his father's profession, and was educated in Wales and at Strasourg, but on returning to England in 1856 he gave up that profession, and was appointed to a clerkship in the Board of Trade, which he has retained ever since. He began to write for St. Paul's Magazine on its establishment under the editorship of Anthony Trollope in 1868, and has also contributed to the Cornhill and other English magazines and to the Century and Harper's Magazine. GENERAL CRITICISM:

"He reigns where Prior and Praed have reigned before him, and this is no little thing to say of any man. . . . He is not merely a writer of vers de société: he is a fabulist, a dramatist in parvo, a lyrist pure and simple. The only occasions upon which he seems to me to fail are those in which he attempts the romantic and heroic styles. . . But in his own way, how perfect an artist, how exquisite a poet! . . . He is always the same acute and refined observer; passing lightly over the surface of things, . . and touching the harmonlous frivolities of by-gone times as the flugers of some macstro might lightly run over the keys of an old-fashioned harpsichord."—E. "He gives the most exhaustive practical account of the beasts of the prairies and lowls of the air that we have ever met with. But he also supplies a complete and comprehensive sketch of the physical configuration of the United States territories from the Mississippi Valley westward to the great mountain-ranges, and from the Canadian line on the north to the Mexican frontier to the southward. . A great part of his book is devoted to the 'noble savage,' of whom, we may remark in passing he entertains the meanest opinion. But we doubt whether any man since the days of Catlin has written on the subject with better information or authority; while the vivacity and evident fidelity of many of his picturesque descriptions remind us greatly of the inimitable Ruxton, and we can scarcely give them higher commendation."—Sat. "So much clever and yet genuine fun in the letter-press, and so much grace and humour in the illustrations, have never before been found within the compass of the same volume. The sweet figure of little Alice contrasts delightfully all through the book with the funny creatures and people she encounters in her most exciting journey; and, as she never makes a slip in her manners or loses her sense of propriety in the most trying situations, her story may be considered as strictly moral as it is exquisitely humorous."—Spectator, xxxix. 1436.

"There is power, buoyancy, intellectual subtlety, and vivid pictures enough in this book to make out a great many poems which would strike the attention of every critic with the least critical insight; but whether the whole makes a poem we are by no means sure. . . "Mr. Domett's shorter poems resemble his long and striking New Zealand poem in this, that they are always graphic, often brilliant, and generally full of force. What, with one or two exceptions, they want is the subduing lyrical feeling which warms and modulates and breathes through the whole. . The key-note is not given by feeling, but by thought."—Spectator, 1.510.

"Every fresh perusal of his work only serves to show beauties not previously observed; and one does not wonder that Mr. Browning thought his 'Ranolf and Amohis' a great and astoulshing performance, of very varied beauty and power, or that Lord Tennyson wrote of it as possessing 'intellectual subtlety, great power of delineating delicious scenery, and imaginative fire.' In truth, it is by far the finest long poem yet written in Australasia."—Acad., xxxiv. 882.

Professor Aldis Wright praised the ingenuity of the theory: Thomas Love Peacock declared that it was of itself sufficient proof of Donaldson's genius; but it seems to have been generally felt that it rests far too absolutely on hazardous speculation."—RICHARD GARMETT: Dict. of Nat Biog., xv. 212.

Francis Baconth Part Anaber of the Plays; Part III. Francis Bacon the Real Author of the Plays; Part III., Parallelism. Book II., The Demonstration: Part I., The Cipher and the Plays; Part II., The Cipher Narrative. Book III., Conclusions. (Mr. Donnelly's theory appears to be that Bacon has revealed his authorship of the plays attributed to Shakespeare by the use of certain significant words so distributed through the works that they can be picked out by their relative distance and position and rearranged in a way to disclose the whole story.)

"There is no question of the labor Mr Donnelly has expended. It is the only thing about which there is no question... He is unfurnished with scholarship or its implements, but he has the cipher."—Nation, xlvii. 135.

Doughty, Charles Montagu, M.A., b. 1843, at Theberton Hall, Saxmundham, Suffolk; brother of Henry Montagu Doughty, infra; educated at private schools and at a school for the royal navy, Portsmouth, and graduated at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, He has travelled extensively on the Continent and in the East. 1. Documents épigraphiques recueillis dans le Nord de l'Arabie. (Edited by E. "An author who takes Arabia for his field challenges comparison with the greatest modern writers of travel. It is the highest tribute we can pay Mr. Doughty to own that, with the charm of Burckhardt and Burton, Palgrave and Palmer, undiminished upon us, we judge his book to be the most remarkable record of adventure and research which has been published to this generation. He enjoyed opportunities that the experience of no one of his predecessors combined. He describes the life of the nomads with a minuteness and colour that will make his work stand for the Bedouin what Lane's famous description is for the modern Egyptians, while he succeeds in carving out individual characters from groups and classes in a way that Lane never attempted."—Speciator, lxi. 480.

"The extraordinary merits of Mr. Doughty's travels... may possibly, we fear, be veiled at least to the general reader by some of the features of their presentation. The author in his preface remarks that his book is not milk for babes; a hasty critic, with not much knowledge and little patience, might say that it is something much more like italis and gravel for ostriches. It is immensely long... It is written in a most miraculous style, suggesting a mixture of Mr. William Morris, Mr. George Meredith, the late Mr. Carlyle, and the living Bir Richard Burton... As for the scientific results of his work, it is sufficient to say that his recovered inscriptions were printed by the Paris Institute, that authorities like M. Renan and the Marquis de Vogué have acknowledged the light they cast on the mysterious Nabathæan monarchy, and the relation of its civilization to Greece on the one hand and to Islam on the other... As for the book itself, we wish that it could be compressed, and to a certain extent translated; but its value as a storehouse of knowledge simply cannot be exaggerated."—Sat. Rev., lxv. 391.

"My chief object has been to assist those who are engaged in the work of Christian missions; but for this purpose I have endeavoured to give a full view of the language so far as I have been able to learn it; and the book is fitted to be equally useful to merchants, travellers, marines, interpreters, and students."—Author's Preface.

"The Chinese words are expressed in the Roman character, and this will undoubtedly prove to be a great drawback to the usefulness of the Dictionary. . . Mr. Douglas holds out the hope that he may publish in a few years a key to the present work, in which he promises to supply as many of the Chinese characters as it is possible to identify. When this is done, it will, for all ordinary purposes, be the best Dictionary in the language yet published."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 283. Sat. Rev., xxvii. 283.

"There can be no doubt that he has an unusual insight into the broader as well as the nicer meanings of Shakspeare In a manner which may be termed 'an honest method, as wholesome as sweet,' he traces by some certain and some supposed steps the growth of Shakspeare's faculties and the course of their development, taking the plays now singly, now in groups, and assigning them to their place in the order which he has found for their creation."

—Sat Rev, xxxix. Sh.

"Professor Dowden's study of the man Shakspere seems to me the best work of the kind that has been written in our language. . . The great body of the work is built on sound induction, out of which no more is drawn than has been put into it "—R. SIMPSON: Acad., vil. 21.

"It appears to us impossible to read many pages of Mr. Dowden's critiques without discovering that the power of the commonplace is ubiquitous and inevitable, and that we vainly seek to escape from it by flying from the world's common objects and interests. For there is a commonplace of culture and refinement yet more tyrannical than that which we have left, and the critics are fast elevating it into a fine art."—Sat. Rev., xiv. 798.

"To wide knowledge of English literature, not confined to favourite authors, but extending over the whole field, Mr. Dowden adds a trained insight into real excellence which enables him to take a just measure of his author, neither unduly exalting him, nor conceding too much to the contemporary disparagement from which his author suffers. And his narrative is enriched by a calm and melsuffers.

7. (Ed.) The Correspondence of Robert Southey and Caroline Bowles; to which are added Correspondence with Shelley, and Southey's Dream: with an introduction, Dublin, 1881, 8vo.

"Professor Dowden, than whom no man living, except perhaps Sir Henry Taylor, could be more fitted to execute the delicate task, has done his work of editing with all the tact and taste which can be wished... It does not, indeed, shed any new light upon the character or career of Southey,—no new light upon the character or career of Southey,—no new light upon the character or career of Southey,—no new light upon the character or career of sympathetic nature who interest us so much as the satellites of genius. Caroline Bowles demands half our attention in this book, and the other half is claimed by the singular relations between Southey and Shelley which are now for the first time revealed."—Sot. Rev., Iiii. 20.

"The reason why Southey's correspondence with the lady who eventually became his second wife has waited so long for publication must be taken to be that which, as Professor Dowden tells us, has induced on the present occasion the printing of a mere selection from it, namely, the voluminous correspondence of Southey which already exists in type.

As Miss Bowles got more familiar with her patron she dropped something of the adoring attitude, developed a pleasant wit, and frequently manifested decided opinions of her own; while Southey on his side fell into the delightful vein of gossiping letter-writing which he could work when he chose, and which shows not the Southey of "The Doctor."—Ath., No. 2226.

9. The Life of Percy Bysshe Shelley, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. Svo.

"At last the world is in possession of that complete life of Shelley, sanctioned by his family and embodying their hitherto carefully reserved materials, which has often been asked for, and sometimes demanded with a certain degree of impatience. . . By the Shelley family, the Erdaile family, (Shelley's grandchildren through his first daughter, Lanthe,) Mr. Forman, Mr Slack, (in respect of the curious and important Hitchener Correspondence,) and others, Professor Dowden has been furnished with matter hitherto unknown or imperiectly known; and he has made good use of it. He writes in the spirit which befits a blographer of Shelley. He believes in Shelley's poetry and his genius; discerns that his character was in some respects singularly beautiful, and his opinions ardent and sincere, if extreme; is willing to believe in his general goodness if he can find adequate grounds for doing so; and scrutinizes the evidence in the hope of finding such grounds, but with a reluctant willingness to give judgment against him on particular points if that proves to be the only course consistent with the evidence. He dwells on nothing invidiously, but adversely on various things. . . His essential though sympathetic moderation of tone is matched by his equability of language: he avoids controversy as far as possible and is never overheated. On occasion he exhibits an incident or describes a scene with effect; but he does not strive to be incisive, or to stimulate the reader to strong and one-sided conclusions. The book is readable rather than powerful or pictorial."—Ath, No. 3985.

"Mr. Dowden has given us such a picture of the man as for fidelity, literalness, and fulness of detail may never again be equalled. He has done everything for Shelley that industry, insight, faithfulness, and loyalty could do. But the total effect produced is not invigorating to the better part of our sympathies. . . Notwithstanding Shelev's earmestness, his sincertry, his unselfshness, hi

A little more constructive skill would have halved the bulk of the work, and a dozen or a score of tables would have doubled its value. . . 8. Reminiscences and Opinions, 1813-1885, Lon., 1886, 8vo; 3d ed. same year.

"The best of Sir Francis Doyle's reminiscences date from a period prior to 1846.... He is out of sympathy with the political life of the present day, and the tone of some of his later recollections and opinions is old-fashioned, if not discordant But, taking the volume as a whole, the reminiscences are those of a genial man of wide culture and broad sympathies; and they form a collection of an ecdotes which, as the production of a single man, is unrivalled in interest, in variety, and in novelty."—Ath., No. 3077.

"The aim of this book,' he says, 'is to describe and explain the process by which a few scattered colonies along the Atlantic seaboard grew into that vast Confederate Republic, the United States of America.' . . It is a genuine pleasure, and rare as it is genuine, to read a work of a historical character which, like this, . . . is serious without being dull, and animated without showing partisanship."— Spectator, Ivi. 86.

"Mr. Doyle's stand-point is not that of a sociologist, but of a student of institutional history. . . . He has enjoyed remarkable facilities for examining colonial documents preserved in the State Paper Office in London. . . Mr. Doyle has viewed the English side of America, and he is consequently better able than most Americans to appreciate the principle of English continuity in our colonial constitution."—Nation, xxxvi. 867.

6. Lectures on Poetry, delivered before the University of Oxford in 1868, Lon., 1869, p. 8vo.

"For the most part the lectures are rightly devoted to inquiries into some of the elements of poetry... They are for the most part singularly graceful in style, displaying the command of language which is best attained in 510.

"He has gone over the field so often travelled in part by our specialists, and so theroughly explored as a whole by Dr Palfrey, and he gives us an admirable returne of the facts and of the impressions made by them upon the mind of an educated Englishman. . These two volumes . . . are attractive in style full of careful research, impartial in judgment, and doubly valuable as giving the opinions of one not blinded to our faults by ties of birth or education."—Nation, xiv. 489.

"We are heartily of opinion that, despite the value of what scholars on this side of the Atlantic have written about the Puritan colonies in America, this work of Doyle's excels al."—Critic, viii. 228.

"Dr. Draper takes one cause, climate, . . . and makes it account for nearly every social phenomenon with which he has to deal. . . . Of the narrative portion of Dr. Draper's work we cannot speak too highly. His sketch of the events which led to the war, and his summing of the Northern and Southern sides of the controversy, are models of calm, perspicuous, and judicial statements. . . . His book, as a whole, will edify a large public indifferent to military criticism and accuracy of military detail."—Nation, v. 207, and x i 94.

"The most interesting chapters in the book are those on spectrum analysis, which show that the author is to be added to the list of those who preceded Kirchhoff in suggesting and applying this wonderful method; doing everything, in fact, but complete the invention and generalize the principles on which it rests."—Natum, xxviii 55.
"In this country the name of Dr. Draper became famous in one hour. . . The celebrated Belfast address of Professor Tyndall, and the thoroughness of his expressed trust in the accuracy and ability of Dr. Draper, sent many people with a rush to the perusal of his works. . It was unfortunate, however, for the reputation of Dr. Draper that the great eulogium of Professor Tyndall was pronounced not on his scientific but on his literary works. For, as these 'Memoirs' show, Dr. Draper has been for many years a careful, diligent, and successful worker in the physical departments of science, and has, without edge. . . His fame as a man of science is secure, but his edge. . . His fame as a man of science is secure, but his place as a philosopher and as a historian rests on a very precarious foundation."—Spectator, ili. 586.

World, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo; 23d ed., (82d thousand,) 1888.

"No one who reads the papers entitled 'Biogenesis,' Degeneration,' Eternal Life,' and 'Classification,' to say nothing of the others in this volume, will fail to recognize in Mr Drummond a new and a powerful teacher, impressive both from the scientific calmness and accuracy of his view of law, and from the deep religious earnestness with which he traces the workings of law in the moral and spiritual sphere. . . . He attempts to show how the same laws which science has discovered in the phenomena of Nature continue, and can be traced, in the phenomena of the spiritual world; how such great principles as biogenesis,—the origination of life only out of what is already living,—not only by analogy, but identically, govern the course of spiritual, as they have been proved to govern that of natural, phenomena. He takes, therefore, some of the chief laws of nature as they have been discovered and stated by evolutionists, and demonstrates their identity with those principles of Christianity which have hitherto been accepted on authority, but have never been reduced to law or compared with the laws of nature. Biogenesis becomes in religion regeneration; spiritual death is want of correspondence; eternal life is perfect correspondence with the spiritual environment—God; conformity to type is conformity to the image of his Son."—Spectator, ivi. 397.

"His great merit lies in his fine descriptions of the scenery and physical characteristics of the country, and in his accurate and sympathetic account of the manners and customs of the peasantry. We think he is sometimes too lavish in his praise of these rude peoples; . . but his pictures of their interiors, of their daily occupations, of their dances and weddings and other festive gatherings, and of their religious worship, are so true and life-like that we can easily forgive him for not having the heart to find fault with a race to which he became fondly attached.

"In spite of redundancy, repetition, and reiteration, these two volumes contain a great deal which disarms attack and merits consideration."—Sat. Rev., 1ii. 700.
"From a literary point of view the book is not without its faults; the dramatis personæ are sometimes made to speak and write in a stilled and sententious way, inconsistent with the character given of them The author arrives in the country ignorant of the language, but very soon begins—in the book—to speak it. Probably the descriptions of places and events are not to be taken as strictly consecutive."—Ath., No. 2817.

"Mr Dunphie is wholly genial in the range of his sympathies, he is delightfully unacademic, he is very observant, he is very reflective, and, like Charles Lamb, he can talk about himself in the quaintest of ways. His observation of nature is less elaborate than that of Jeffries or John Burroughs, but within its own limits and for its own quite different ends it is as satisfactory. But, fond as Mr. Dunphie is of nature, he is much fonder of people. The ways of men and women are really the favourite subjects of his half-humorous, half-pathetic studies."—Acad.

Dutt, Toru, 1856-1877, youngest of the three daughters of Govin Chunder Dutt, a magistrate in his native province and a man of learning and cultivation, who survives them all. She made a very thorough study of the language and literature of France and of England, and in 1874 published a very full and learned essay on the writings of Leconte de Lisle, with translations into English verse. Having devoted herself to the study of Sanskrit, she translated the Vishnupurana into English blank verse. Meanwhile she was composing and trans-lating poetry with extraordinary assiduity and apparently with equal case in Hindustani, French, and English. She wrote also a romance in French, Le Journal de Mile. d'Arvers, which was published in Paris, with a critical study by Mile. Clarisse Bader, in 1879. She left some original poems in English, and other productions.

"His whole performance has more of an excursive than an analytical character, and comprises a great variety of interesting etymological topics which are in general lightly and agreeably handled "—Spectator, xlv. 951

"The merits of the book, and they are great and many, lie in the details ... What Mr Earle has to tell us about the history and usages of particular words and idioms is in almost every case happy ... He constantly shows the surest sign of a thinker who has gone to the bottom of his subject, that of saying things which, as soon as we hear them, make us wonder that we had never thought of them ourselves."—Sal. "The greater part of the work is devoted... to showing how the spoils system in England grew out of the absolute ownership of offices by the crown, and was modified but not improved by the substitution of party government; and how, as its abuses became rank and intolerable, a rising spirit of public reprobation kept pace with them, till at last the sense and virtue of the English people overpowered the selfishness of a class and triumphed by the destruction of the system. The author makes skilful use of the occasions such a review presents for enforcing the need and the practicability of just such a national purgation among ourselves."—Nation, xxx. 46

"Dr. Edersheim is a Hebrew Christian, who believes that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and all his Hebrew that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and all his Hebrew learning—which is great—is used strictly for the setting-forth of this great theme. He has thrown light on many obscure points in the gospel history, and he has written the history of the time between the closing of the Old Testament and the opening of the New as it was never written before. His strength lies in his wide and deep and accurate Jewish learning. The weakness of the book lies there also, It is overloaded with references to all kinds of Jewish topics."—Specialor, 1vii 286.

"The inquiry to which the author has here devoted far more attention than it has hitherto received is not altogether new. For a century and a half the critics have recognized in Milton an assimilative instinct, over which his mental constitution did not enable him to exercise much control. It was a perfectly natural instinct with him; it invigorated his poetic capacity, and stands in no need of excuse or defence. . . Of later years the Dutch poet Vondel has been regarded by his countrymen as Milton's chief creditor. . . The only English writer before Mr. Edmundson who has thought it worth while to bring any exact knowledge to a discussion of it is Mr Edmund Gosse. "Mr. Eggleston's stories have held from the beginning a great popularity with a large circle of readers, and it has been in many ways well deserved. They are full of incident: all of these rapid events occur amid scenes almost entirely new to the Eastern reader and the new generation of Westerners; and they have in a high degree the element of dialectic speech, which . . . confers upon the personages of the story that appearance of reality and individuality for which the novel-writer has to watch so keenly and work so hard."—Nation, xix. 207.

"If we feel that we could sometimes have spared some "If we feel that we could sometimes have spared some of the copious learning which Mr. Ellis brings to bear on his subject, our general feeling is one of the most genuine admiration. Its variety and plenty is such as it is difficult to describe. One peculiarity of it is that it passes, for the most part, the more familiar authors, to deal with those who are strange even to the well-read scholars of the ordinary stamp. He has drawn, he says in his preface, his parallel citations and illustrations 'from the predecessors or contemporaries rather than from the followers of Catullus; from the less hackneyed writers, such as Plautus, Lucilius, Varro, rather than from such as have become insipid by familiarity; from Greek preferably to Latin.' It is difficult to describe how consistently this has been done. It is not too much to say that most scholars will often find themselves introduced to an almost unknown world of ancient literature by this 'Commentary.'" Spectator, 1. 568.

"It would be rash to affirm that Mr Elton has added much knowledge that is absolutely new to our store. He has not been a discoverer, like Grimm, Kemble, or Guest, but he must still rank high among those to whom we are indebted for our knowledge of what this island and its inhabitants were in the remote times before history, as commonly written, becomes credible."—Alti, No. 2842.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1803-1882, b. in Boston, Mass.; was educated at the Boston Latin School, and at Harvard College. After graduating in 1821, he taught school for three years, attended lectures at the Cambridge Divinity School, entered the Unitarian ministry, and in 1829 became the colleague of Henry Ware at the Second Church in Boston.

In 1832 he resigned his charge, announcing the scruples which led him to do so in a sermon on "The Lord's Supper," afterwards published among his works. He continued, however, to preach occasionally in Unitarian pulpits for several years. In 1833 he went to Europe, visited Italy, Sicily, and France, spent some time in England, and paid a visit to Carlyle at Craigenputtock. In 1835 he settled at Concord, Mass. He delivered courses of lectures in Boston during several successive winters; founded in 1836 the society which acquired the name of the Transcendental Club, and was a contributor to The Dial during its brief existence, 1840-44, and for two years its editor. In 1847 he revisited England, lecturing in Manchester, London, and other towns, and in 1848 he made an excursion to Paris. On the establishment of the Atlantic Monthly in 1857 he became a contributor, and many of his poems were published in its pages. In the years before and during the civil war he lectured on the questions involved in the conflict. In 1872 his house at Concord was partially destroyed by It was rebuilt by his friends, and he paid a third visit to Europe, remaining abroad about a year. He lectured occasionally till 1876, but in the last years of his life his memory became much impaired. In 1881 nis me nis memory became much impaired. In 1881 he read a paper on Carlyle before the Massachusetts Historical Society. For biog., see Cabot, J. L., supra, Garnett, R., and Holmes, O. W., infra; also Conway, M. D., and Cooke, G. W., supra. "The first eight volumes of the present edition of Mr. Emerson's writings contain his collected Essays as he left them, except some revision of the punctuation and the correction of obvious mistakes. The ninth volume comprises the pieces chosen by Mr. Emerson from the 'Poems' and 'May-Day' to form the 'Selected Poems,' with the addition of some poems which were omitted in that selection, and some that have remained unpublished. In many instances emendations which were pencilled in the margin by Mr. Emerson, but were not adopted in the 'Selected Poems,' are now introduced, upon the ground that, as they seem to have suggested themselves at the time when his powers were in their fullest vigor, it may fairly be supposed that he would, upon reconsideration, have admitted them. The tenth and eleventh volumes consist of lectures hitherto unprinted, and of 'Occasional Addresses' and other prose writings which have appeared separately or in periodiculs."—Prefutory Note by J. E. Cubot.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"His work is not of the stuff that one can clip scarlet patches from. The matter and the form are inseparable, as one finds them in the best talk... He produces the effect of conversation rather than of literature; his thoughts are spoken out for the stirring of kindred thought rather than written down for learning "—Sal. Rev., xil. 275.

"It is just in the combination of an ideal height and "It is just in the combination of an ideal height and range of thought with balance and sanity that we find Emerson's charm He constantly teaches us in his informal way, as Berkeley taught us with classical English and philosophy, that idealism is nothing else than common sense transfigured and enthroned above sophistry."—Sat.

mal way, as Berkeley taught us with classical English and philosophy, that idealism is nothing else than common sense transfigured and enthroned above sophistry."—Sal. Rev. 1vi 118.

"More than any of the other great writers of the age, he is a Voice—He is almost impersonal. He is pure from the taint of sect, clique, or party—He does not argue, but announces; he speaks when the Spirit moves him, but not longer—Better than any contemporary, he exhibits the might of the spoken word—He helps us to understand the enigma how Confucius and Buddha and Socrates and greater teachers still should have produced such marvellous effects by mere oral utterance."—Richard Garnett: Life of Emerson, "Great Writers,") 188

"Look through all Emerson's writings, and then consider whether in all interature you can find a man who has better fulfilled that aspiration stated in such condensed words by Joubert, 'to put a whole book into a page, a whole page into a phrase, and that phrase into a word.'... And if you say that, nevertheless, this is nothing so long as an author has not given us a system of the universe, it can only be said that Emerson never desired to do this, but left on record the opinion that' lis too young by some ages yet to form a creed. The system-makers have their place, no doubt; but, when we consider how many of them have risen and fallen since Emerson began to write.—Coleridge, Schelling, Cousin, Comte, Mill, and so on, down to the Hegel of yesterday and the Spencer of to-day,—it is really evident that the absence of a system cannot prove much more short-lived than the possession of that commodity. It must be left for future generations to determine Emerson's precise position even as a poet. There is seen in him the tantalizing combination of the profoundest thoughts with the greatest possible variation in artistic work,—sometimes mere boldness and almost waywardness, while at other times he achieves the most exquisite melody touched with a certain wild grace. He has been likened to an molian harp, which now gi may be the highest and most inspiring imaginative clairvoyance to a brighter one.... Too much has been made of Emerson's mysticism. He was an intellectual rather than an emotional mystic, and withal a cautious one. He never let go the string of his balloon. He never threw over all his balast of common sense so as to rise above an atmosphere in which a rational being could breathe."— OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES: Life of Emerson, 390, 396.

"We have not in Emerson a great poet, a great writer, a great philosophy-maker. His relation to us is not that of one of those personages; yet it is a relation of, I think, even superior importance. His relation to us is more like that of the Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius. Marcus Aurelius is not a great writer, a great philosophy-maker; he is the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit Emerson is the same. He is the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit. All the points in thinking which are necessary for this purpose he takes;
but he does not combine them into a system or present them as a regular philosophy. Combined in a system by a man with the requisite talent for this kind of thing, they would be less useful than as Emerson gives them to us; and the man with the talent so to systematize them would be less impressive than Emerson. They do very well as they now stand—like 'boulders,' as he says,—in 'paragraphs incompressible, each sentence an infinitely repellent particle.' In such sentences his main points recur again and again, and become fixed in the memory.

... Yes, truly, his insight is admirable; his truth is preclous Yet the secret of his effect is not even in these: it is in his tempor. It is in the hopeful, serene, beautiful temper wherewith these, in Emerson, are indissolubly joined; in which they work and have their being."— MATTHEW ARNOLD: Discourses in America, 178-180, 193.

"A forest of letters, many of which are not in the least characteristic of the writer, while some of them are wearisome, and even painful, because surcharged with evangelic phriscology and morbid self-introspection. We have read, it is true, with pleasure many of the letters in this work. Nevertheless the unique personality which Bishop Ewing has sketched so lovingly in the 'Present-Day Papers' is not here.'—Spectator, 1.793: notice of vol. i. "The present volume is not merely a collection of letters, and it is a source of great satisfaction that, though the hands of the editor have been tied, he has received and been authorized to publish the reminiscences of three friends of Thomas Erskine, from which the world at large will learn what manner of man he was, both in society and in the retirement of Linlathen; and these friends are Miss Wedgwood, Principal Shairp, and the Dean of Westminster."—Spectator, 1. 1661: notice of vol. ii.

"The few pages of Mr Evans's introductory notice prepare the reader for fluding, in this work of an anonymous biographer, matter of real 'value and interest as a document illustrating the history of England in the seventeenth century.' The editor has faithfully carried out his purpose of presenting the 'manuscript, which came into his possession about fifty years ago,' exactly as it stands, with all its characteristic faults of spelling, style, and composition, and the result is in most lively contrast with certain modern attempts at biographical representations of the style of two hundred years ago,"—Sat. Rev., xliii. 111.
"A book of singular value and interest, which not only adds to our knowledge of England and her Church in the seventeenth century, but also introduces us to a personality which it is impossible to regard without feelings of reverence and even of affection "—Spectator, 1. 218.

King Henry II., &c., Lon., 1879, 4to.

"That consummate antiquary, Mr. R. W. Eyton, . . . has produced two quarto volumes of singular interest and importance to students of Domesday and of the eventful reignot Henry II. . . It is to be feared, however, that the scholarship and learning displayed on every page of these two volumes will command less attention than they deserve, from the unattractive form in which they are presented to the reader."—E C WATERS: Acad, xvi 275.

"It is meant for those who take a sufficient interest in medieval history to be at the pains of studying it for themselves, and who demand a guide to lead them in their own researches, and a storehouse of facts on which to base their own deductions."—Alh., No. 2886.

These Lectures will be read with interest by many who are no controversialists, while the numerous notes will furnish students with valuable references, and convince them of the trustworthiness of the guide who is here pointing out a path for them."—Ath., No. 2289.

"Dr. Farrar is familiar with the scenes and the customs of Palestine and its inhabitants, from his personal observation as well as from the accounts of other travellers; he is acquainted—as his notes constantly show—with all the authorities, ancient and modern, orthodox and rationalist, whose names he arrays in a long list; he is devoutly Chrittian in his islit; moderate and liberal after the manner of our English Church divines; desirous to aid the cause of truth and righteousness by what he writes; and with these qualifications, intellectual, moral, and religious, he pours forth the torreuts of rhetoric which form these two volumes . The words are too big for his thoughts, and the poverty of the fancies is not concealed by the tinsel epithets with which they are tricked out."—Spectator, xivii, 886.

"They seem to us to exhibit all the faults of his earlier efforts in an exaggerated form, without possessing some of the qualities which helped to atone for them. The style, in particular,—never a strong point with our author,—is unlikely to satisfy even his ardent admirers, fluctuating as it does between turgid rhetoric and a tone of jaunty familiarity better suited to the columns of the American daily press. . There can be no question as to the value and importance of his labours, if only they approximate to his ideal standard; and it is because, in our judgment, they fail to do so that we can accept them with but qualified approval."—Sca. Rev., xiviii. 603.

"The success which his work has met with is easily understood. There is the charm of a refined rhetorical style, not too heavily freighted with thought. The reader floats easily and laxily along, past all the whirlpools of modern criticism, and without a jar arrives at the destined conclusion. The flavour of learning of a vast and multitudinous kind is presented. There is everywhere a studied reverence and a careful setting forth of conclusions precious to the hearts of thousands, and great care is taken to keep the dry details of history out of view. . . . We get little help from Canon Farrar to the solution of the many critical problems which have arisen in recent years in relation to the Epistles of Paul and to the Acts of the Apostles. . . The reader of these volumes might read them through without becoming aware of the weighty controversies which are now agitating the Churches on these questions. . . . It is, however, true that readers of this book will gain a more vivid conception of the moral, social, and religious condition of the world when Christianity went forth for the regeneration of the nations. . . Canon Farrar has largely succeeded in setting forth the outward circumstances, the social forces, the special training, which moulded the character of Paul . . . His large acquaintance with the Jewish literature outside of and beyond the sacred books, and his profuse citation of relevant passages often throw a ficod of light on obscure passages in the life of Paul and on difficult passages in his writings, while the description he gives of the great controversy of the early Church, and of the intense bitterness which marked that contest, is characterized both by fulness of information and accuracy of statement. —Specialor, Ili. 1849.

In 1858 he was deprived of sight by an accident, but in the next year returned to the university, where he took his M.A. degree and in 1863 was elected professor of political economy. He was elected M.P. for Brighton in 1865, and continued to represent that constituency till 1874, when he lost his seat in the general election, but two months later was returned for Hackney. In 1880 he became postmaster-general, and in 1883 was elected lord rector of Glasgow University. For biog., see Stephen, Leslie, infra. 1. "The doctrines which he preaches have at least the merits of simplicity and consistency. He has told us constantly that, whilst the rich are growing richer, the poor, if not growing poorer, are certainly not making any corresponding advance. He has given us his remedies, which consist principally in a compulsory system of education, and in the general adoption of the co-operative system in manufactures and agriculture. . . His book is thoroughly honest, and honest in the sense of speaking unpalatable truth to the working-classes."—Sal. Rev., xxxi 503.

"The main remedy for this vast evil which presents itself to Mr. Fawcett's mind seems to us utterly futile,—that is, the diffusion through the laboring classes of a sense of their duty to check population."—Nation, xiii 10.

"Mr Fawcett discusses various questions connected with pauperism, and explains what is in his view the right thing to be done with the House of Lords. Mrs Fawcett diates on the wrongs of women, and moreover sets forth, with the zeal of a thorough going disciple, the merits of Mr Hare's scheme of representation . . . Perhaps both Mr and Mrs Fawcett are a little too certain of their own infallibility, and too much convinced that the very last

"Mr. Fearon, who has been greatly distinguished, first as one of the most skilful and methodical of inspectors, and subsequently as having taken a large and very useful share in the administration of the Endowed Schools Act, has here brought together into a compact manual the practical rules which should be followed by an inspector who wishes to do his work with finished excellence."—

VI. The Iranians. (To consist of ten vols.)

"Mr. Featherman has set himself a long and laborious task. To digest from the travellers' tales of the last two centuries, the reports of missionaries, and the more formal observations of recent explorers, all that can be ascertained of the social life of every tribe of the many races of mankind: to reconcile the contradictions of these various authorities; and to discriminate where preindice or credulty may have led them wrong, are undertakings that demand a vast expenditure of time, a great accumulation of knowledge, and some critical acumen. Mr. Featherman is well equipped in these respects. He justly repudiates the faint praise that would damn him as a mere collector of facts and give him credit for nothing but industry in collecting them. He claims that he is writing, on the basis of facts collected from original authorities, a history of the peoples in their social capacity, including their manners and customs, their government, their religion, their superstitions, and their literary, artistic, and scientific advancement. He is, at any rate, engaged on a work which is such a storehouse of facts as the student of comparative sociology will not meet with elsewhere, arranged with simplicity and clearness."—Ah, No. 3125.

Ferguson, Sir Samuel, Q.C., LL.D., 1810-1886, b. in Belfast, Ireland; graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, 1826; was called to the Irish bar in 1838, and made Queen's counsel in 1859. In 1867 he was appointed the first deputy keeper of the public records in Ireland, in recognition of his eminent service to Irish antiquities, and showed great ability in organizing the records department, for which he was knighted in 1878. He was elected president of the Royal Irish Academy in 1882. One of his early poems, The Forging of the Anchor, was introduced to the readers of Blackwood's Magazine by Christopher North, who, in his Noctes Ambrosianæ, gave it warm praise and predicted success for the writer. He contributed translations from the Irish, as well as hie contributed translations from the Irish, as well as posens and tales, to the Dublin University Magazine and other periodicals, and many papers on Irish antiquities to the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy. 1. A new and revised edition of the whole, with considerable additions by the author, edited by H. F. Tozer, bears the general title of A History of Greece from its Conquest by the Romans to the Present Time, B.C. 146 to A.D. 1864, Oxf., 1877, 7 vols. 8vo.) "Finlay is a great historian, of the type of Polybius, Procopius, and Machiavelli, a man of affairs, who has qualified himself for treating of public transactions by sharing in them, a soldier, a satesman, and an economist. He is not picturesque or eloquent, or a master of the delineation of character, but a singular charm attaches to his pages from the perpetual consciousness of contact with a vigorous intelligence."—RICHARD GARNETT: Dict. of Nat. Blog, xix. 31.

Fitzgerald, Edward, 1809-1883, b. at Bredfield,

Suffolk; was the son of John Purcell, of Kilkenny, Ireland, who took his wife's name of Fitzgerald. He was educated at Bury Grammar-School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1830 and formed life-long friendships with Tennyson and Thackeray. He married Lucy, daughter of Bernard Barton, the Quaker poet. (q. v., unte, vol. i.,) but a separation by mutual agreement took place soon afterwards. Fitzgerald spent most of his life at his house near Woodbridge, Suffolk, devoting himself to his favorite studies and literary work. His books were issued anonymously; his translation of the Agamemnon was at first privately printed, and of a translation made by him of the Edipus Tyrannus and Coloneus of Sophocles he allowed only one rannus and Coloneus of Sophocles he allowed only one friend in England to have a copy. 1. Fitz, G. W. Coomb Desert: a Novel, Lon., 1876, and Absal of Jami, in English verse, 1878; 5th ed., 1870. (The first edition of the Rubaiyat fell absolutely dead from the press, and was soon consigned to the fourpenny box." of second-hand dealers. D. G. Rossetti was one of its first admirers. Copies of it are now worth their weight in gold, owing partly to the belief that the poem, when again issued, was spoiled in re-vision. There is at least a great difference between the vision. There is at least a great difference between the first edition and the later ones.)

"It is not as a translation that the English-speaking people have accepted the 'Rubátyát' into their literature,—it is as an original poem."—Sat. Rev., 1ki. 98.

'His firme will mainly rest on his marvellous rendering of the 'Quatrains' of Omar Khayyám,... which he has made to live in a way that no translation ever lived before. In his hands the 'Quutrains' became a new poem."—W. Aldis WRIGHT: Dict. of Nat. Biog., xix. 112.

"Had the Ruba'yát been translated into Latin or German four centuries ago, or into English within the memory of many still living, Albert Dürer and Blake would assuredly have been beforehand with Elihu Vedder. But neither Albert Dürer nor Blake, nor any other master dead and gone, could, I venture to think, have exceeded in sublimity and subtlety of conception at least a score of these extraordinary designs."—AMELIA B. 6. Agamemnon: a Tragedy, taken from Æschylus, Lon., 1876, 4to.

"Convinced of the impossibility of presenting the Greek play in its integrity to English readers, and doubtful of his power to succeed where good versifiers and better scholars had seemed to him to fail, he determined to recast the 'Agamemnon' of the Attic poet, adhering in parts to the original, and in parts diverging from it, according to his sense of fitness. The result is that, while the whole poem is profoundly penetrated with the Æschylean spirit, which it reproduces with wonderful vividness, and while certain portions are accurate transcripts from the original, the Greek student will find many of the most impressive passages suppressed, and some most carefully prepared effects omitted... Mr. Fitzgerald's style in the finest passages of this great torso has a weight, a compactness, and a picturesqueness, to find the proper parallel for which we must look back to Shakespere's age."—J. "At length, six years after Fitzgerald's death, we have these three volumes, of which the last two contain nearly all that he ever printed, and the first some three hundred and fifty letters from his pen, written between 1832 and 1883, to Frederic Tennyson, Bernard Barton, Archdeacon Allen, Prof Cowell and Prof. Norton, W. B Donne, Samuel Lawrence, Mr. J. R. Lowell, and twenty others... as his highest achievement, Mr. Fitzgerald has tried conscientiously—that is, with as much conscientiousness as a writer on theatrical subjects often exhibits—to make it good. His materials have been diligently collected, quarters hitherto neglected have been explored, a mass of new information has been obtained. . . In spite of all the efforts he has made, Mr. Fitzgerald's book, pleasant as it is to read, is marred by an all but continuous series of slips and mistakes. . . "One of the suppressed characters of English history is restored to us, and we marvel only that Lord Shelburne's autobiography should have waited to be edited by his great-grandson, instead of having been published early in the present century by his son, unless, as we hear, its existence was really unknown till last year. . . The characters of leading statesmen are gems, and engigrams which will dwell in the memory abound "—Ath., No. 2471." Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice has succeeded in placing before us a wealth of new matter which, while casting valuable and much-needed light on several obscure passages in the political history of a hundred years ago, has enabled us for the first time to form a clear and consistent idea of his ancestor, who played so distinguished a part in the great drama, but of whom hitherto it might, though in another sense, be as truly said as of his contemporary, Junius, 'Stat nominis umbra,' "—Spectaor, xilx. 1476.

11. Life of the Very Rev. Thomas N. Burke, O.P., Lon., 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"We should be ungrateful not to admit that he has done

"We should be ungrateful not to admit that he has done his work laboriously and conscientiously, for he has given us a great deal of enjoyment. He had certain essential qualifications for his task,—a fervid appreciation of religious eloquence, a keen perception of Irish humour, and a heartfelt reverence for Father Thomas Burke. And for these very reasons we are sure he would be the first to admit that the Life might well have been written by a man who had the real biographical genius which flowers, like the fabulous aloe, only once in some hundred years. . . . Father Burke was one of those remarkable men who might live in the friendship of unborn generations. He was nobly great, yet extremely human. . . In many respects he came nearer to the ideal of his Master's career than any clergyman of whom we have ever read."—Sat. Rev., 1xi. 445. 12. (Ed.) ters and Correspondence: with Notices of his Life and Times, Lon., 1888, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The O'Connell of this correspondence is a most human creature, good, lovable, honest, but no more heroic than ruffianly, and the chief impression it creates is of surprise that a character so ordinary should gain such surprising influence and make so'great a mark in the world's history.

The letters show us a man of streendour viscour influence and make so great a mark in the world's history.

. The letters show us a man of stupendous vigour, of large and ready sympathies, of tender and deep domestic affections, of good sense and some acumen, and of religious feeling that is really touching in its child-like simplicity and unquestioning faith; but neither his religion nor his patriotism inspired him to the sterner virtues of austerity and self-sacrifice. Nor does he seem to have had a lofty or uncommon thought: indeed, the O'Connell of these volumes is as good as bread, and as ordinary."

to Archibald Fletcher, (1746-1828,) a Scotch advocate of liberal principles, who was intimate with C. J. Fox, Henry Erskine, and other notable persons, and was called the "father of burgh reform." Autobiography of Mrs. Fletcher, of Edinburgh: with Selections from Letters and other Family Memorials. Compiled and arranged by the Survivor of her Family, [Lady Richardson, widow of Sir John Richardson, the Arctic ex-plorer.] Carlisle, 1874, Svo, (this was a small edition printed for private circulation;) Edin., 1875, 8vo.

"This interesting volume contains more than the title-page promises There are not only the incidents of the Yorkshire and Scottish life of Mrs Fletcher, told by her-self, but a sympathetic memoir, also by Mrs Fletcher, of her gentle daughter, Grace, and another of her son Archi-bald, by his widow. The whole forms an attractive, and often amusing, picture of life in Great Britain in the last and present centuries. . . . It is emphatically a charming book."—Ath., No 2479.

"All claret would be port if it could,' and most American novels would be by Mr. Henry James if they had the luck. 'The Head of Medusa' is no exception to this rule. The situations, the 'international' combinations of English, Americans, and Italians, are constructed on the model of Mr. James's stories. . . The padding, of which 'The Head of Medusa' is all compact, is sentimental in the manner of Miss Thackeray. . . The book is full of talent."

"It is not the solving of a riddle, but the development of two or three simple, noble motives... The action is much simpler than anything the author has before attempted, and her style has gained correspondingly... There is only so much of the fair Italian sky and sea as to throw into relief the figures, but so deft, so sympathetic is the choice, the few pages give the sense that all Italy is in the book.'—Nation, xxxvin. 301.

"All histories of abstract ideas are liable to the same defect,—hamely, that they tend to become mere abstracts of the books professedly published on the subject. Professor Flint is no exception. After an attempt, in an introduction of sixty pages, to pursue and disengage his idea through the early, classical, and mediæval periods, he fairly lapses into the usual system of analyzing books.

We are most thankful to Mr. Flint for the labour he has bestowed on giving in an intelligible form a summary of the speculations, or ideas, of Schlözer, von Müller. Kant, Schelling, Steffens, Görres, Krause, Lotze, many of whose books are either inaccessible or are too tolkome reading to repay the time it would cost to extract any valuable metal om the dross."—Sal. "Mr. Foley has at last brought his gigantic labours to a close... He has collected such a mass of curious and really valuable information as it is granted to very few students to gather by the researches of a lifetime. He has added materially to those recondite sources of authentic family history which are for the most part buried in private archives and guarded with superstitious exclusiveness from the vulgar gaze. He has drawn back the veil which for centuries had covered the working of the Jesuits in England, and which, while it was allowed to hide the doings of the fathers from the gaze of the profane, invested them with a glamour of awe and terror such as no secret society of past or present times has succeeded in throwing society of past or present times has succeeded in throwing round its proceedings."—4th, No. 2912.

"He is one of the most distinguished of the many able police-officers of the Indian Service, and his share in the preventive and precautionary measures taken in Bombay during the Mutiny gained for him the esteem of every Anglo-Indian and the deep and lasting gratitude of the native inhabitants. Born and educated also wholly in India, he can speak of the thoughts and feelings of the natives almost as one of themselves. No living Englishman, indeed, is better entitled to be heard on the sources of our real dangers in India. . . "Even the truest admirers of Keats will read these letters with a sense that they are prying into what he would have kept from them if he could. . . We cannot say, then, that the reading of this little volume has given us anything like unmixed pleasure. We have felt all through it that we were guilty of an intrusion, which, like all intrusions into such a region, Keats would have warmly resented. And we have felt, too, something besides this, ... that much in these letters which Keats could easily have justified, and would have justified, if he had been writing a poem or a play, by the very simple expedient of making us see the object of his passion, as well as the glow of the subjective passion itself, has an uncomfortably naked, unnatural effect here, when we have only his own side of the relation, and hardly even a single glimpse of the other side of it. .. But, though this little book is in both the ways we have mentioned distasteful to us, it would be false to say that it is without interest. It bears the marks of Keats's genius in many of the letters, and the marks of Keats's genius in many of the letters, and the marks of his individual character in almost all."—Spectator, il. 410.

"We do not think Mr. Buxton Forman's publication necessary. It can hardly give pleasure to any one who cares for Keats, or, if it does, the pleasure is so mingled with pain that, to use the poet's own phrase, 'it tastes like brass on the palate.'"—Sal. Rev., xlv. 216.

"I think there is nothing dishonourable in the joy with which we welcome these dear relies of Keats. . . They relate to what happened nearly sixty years ago; hardly any one, except Mr. Severn and Mr. Wells, can remember any of the persons concerned; and the lady herself, to whom these letters were addressed, expressed before she died, in 1856, her belief that they would be eventually required for publication There has, therefore, been no indecent hurry in the matter, and Mr. Forman has displayed in editing them a scrupulous care and a tasteful delicacy that will do him great credit. He is a bibliographer of genius, and on every obscure point he has patiently concentrated the light of investigation."—EDMUND W. Gosse: Acad, xiii. 111.

5. The Lite of Charles Dickens, Lon., 1871-74, 3 vols. Svo.

"A book which, in spite of the many traits of astonishing perceptive power, and prodigal generosity, and unbounded humour, contained in it, will certainly not add to the personal fascination with which Dickens is regarded by so many of his countrymen. On the whole, we cannot deny that Mr. Forster's blography was a very difficult book indeed to write, or that it has been well done. It has painted to us a picture morally much more disappointing than we expected, and it has perhaps dwelt on some of the most disappointing features at unnecessary length, and with a certain awkward air of half admission, half deprecation. There is far too much criticism on individual works of Dickens, to some of which Mr Forster recurs repeatedly; and it does not appear to us that the criticism is always sound. . . But, with all these faults and shortcomings, Mr. Forster's Life of Dickens will always be eagerly read as long as Dickens himself is eagerly read; and that will be as long as Englishmen retain their delight in English literature "—Spectator, xivii 174.

"The portrait of Dickens is, indeed, very incomplete and unsatisfactory; but it would be unfair to deny that it puts us in possession of many facts which render both the merits and the defects of the novels more intelligible. That will be its principal merit, for its independent interest is certainly less than might have been expected from the subject."—Sal. Rev., xxxvii. 182.

"On the whole, we have in Mr. Forster's biography a difficult work well done. We believe it gives with candor the means of forming a sound judgment of the nature and character of its subject. That it gives the true estimate of his literary genius and of the quality and rank of his various works we for one shall not say; but it would be strange indeed if the average reader and student of an author should think so highly of him and feel so warmly about him as his intimate friend, admirer, and biographer, with all a biographer's and all a friend's fealty and fondness. . . To the fulness of detail in the story of the novelist's exterior life, of his literary methods, and of the production and appearance of his books, we suppose no afterworker in this field can much hope to add anything that has escaped Mr. Forster's knowledge or scrutiny, or for which his copiousness has not found room."—Nation, xviii.

6. Life of Jonathan Swift: vol. i., 1667-1711, Lon.,

"With the conscientiousness and thoroughness to which

"With the conscientiousness and thoroughness to which his previous works have accustomed us, Mr. Forster has gathered, sifted, and interpreted the materials within his reach, there is in his book much that is new by the side of what is old, but more that is true in the place of what is false. In the way of positive discoveries of fresh facts of importance there is, as yet at all events, little to announce "—Sad Rev., xi 714.

"To the student of the period, one of the most interesting in our annals, Mr. Forster's blography promises to be invaluable ... The writer seems to be overweighted by his materials: he has so much to say, so many errors to point out, so many objections to meet, so many allusions to explain, that the narrative is occasionally impeded and does not move freely. The author never stops without a cause, or without having some noteworthy fact to state, but nevertheless the reader, instead of being driven smoothly along the road, finds himself suddenly pulled up. The literary student will enjoy this heartily, for he is sure to gain generous refreshment at these halting-points, but the general reader, whose interest in Swift is comparatively slight, and whose knowledge of the age is superficial, will hardly appreciate the wealth of illustration Mr. Forster has at his command."—Spectator, xlix. 47.

Fortescue, Hon. John. Records of Stag-Hunting on Exmoor: with Fourteen Full-Page Illustrations

"Stag-hunting on Exmoor is a curious survival of very ancient manners and customs that prevailed not only in Eugland, but throughout Europe, or at least Northern Europe, long, long ago. . . Mr. Fortescue is well qualified to write on a subject of such interest not only to the huntingwrite on a subject of such interest not only to the nunting-man, but also to the antiquary and the general reader. His ancestors have hunted the wild deer for many cen-turies. . . The illustrations . . . are of a very high class, after beautiful drawings of the scenery, the deer, and the hounds."—Sal. "His work is the outcome of a long and high tradition. He is one of those who look on morality as something not imposed on man from without, but the resultant, the realization, of his whole nature . . . He has produced what is, perhaps, for students the best existing work on the subject. It will show them how the lessons of their old text-books can without any strain beso extended as to cover the vast and complex interests of modern life."—Alfred W. Benn: Acad., xxxii. 47.

Horace N. Pym. Lon., 1881, r. 8vo; new ed., 1883.

"Thrown partly by accident, partly by the connections of her family and her father's scientific reputation, partly by her own personal charm and her delight in the society of remarkable people, into contact with an extraordinary number of such persons, Miss Fox had also the industry to make notes of what site heard and saw, and the genius (for no lesser word will do) to put these notes in the most striking if also the least pretentious manner. The persons chiefly illustrated in these "Memories" are Derwent and Hartley Coleridge, J. S. Mill, Sterling, Carlyle, and Bunsen; but it is hardly too much to say that few Englishmen or residents in England celebrated in science and letters between 1840 and 1850 fail to make some appearance here."—

Henry the First, Oxf., 1882, 2 vols. 8vo.

"From Mr. Freeman's point of view—or rather from one of his many points of view, for he looks at his subject in many aspects—the period from the accession of William Rufus down to the overthrow of Robert of Bellième by King Henry was the time in which was worked out the problem of reconciling the English nation to the Norman Conquest, of nationalizing, as Mr. Freeman expresses it, the Conquest and the dynasty which the Conquest had brought in... There are no signs of the wearness and exhaustion that sometimes mark a continuation Mr. Freeman is as profoundly interested in his work, as decided in his views of right and wrong, as minute and careful in working out every detail, as ever."—Sat. Rev., 1111 566.

"The last thirteen years of the eleventh century are depicted with all the wealth of detail, all the vividness of narrative, all the tulness of local and personal knowledge, which distinguish Mr Freeman's history of the Norman Conquest. The first course is precisely adapted to an audience that had never heard of Mr Freeman or of 'the English people in their three homes.' The thought is excessively diluted, but it is agreeably stated, and will prepare the neophyte very satisfactorily for the stronger meat of the second course . . . "Mr. Freeman has done much more than compile a hand-book for students; he has made a substantial contribution to political history. He has not only given definitions of boundaries, but he has shown the causes of the alteration in each case. In this way he has supplied a framework of European history, and has accounted for the process of differentiation by which the various states were formed. . . Mr Freeman's book will for the future place at every one's command accurate knowledge of the points involved in proposals of territorial changes. It deserves to be reckoned as an indispensable introduction to the study of foreign politics."—Ath, No. 2792.

"From Mr. Freeman's point of view—or rather from one of his many points of view, for he looks at his subject in many aspects—the period from the accession of William Rufus down to the overthrow of Robert of Bellème by King Henry was the time in which was worked out the problem of reconciling the English nation to the Norman Conquest, of nationalizing, as Mr. Freeman expresses it, the Conquest and the dynasty which the Conquest had brought in. . . There are no signs of the weariness and exhaustion that sometimes mark a continuation. Mr. Freeman is as profoundly interested in his work, as decided in his views of right and wrong, as minute and careful in working out every detail, as ever."—Sal. Rev., hit 566.

"The last thirteen years of the eleventh century are depicted with all the wealth of detail, all the vividness of narrative, all the fulness of local and personal knowledge, which distinguish Mr Freeman's history of the Norman Conquest But, it must be confessed, the later part of the story falls in interest considerably behind the earlier."

"It must be confessed that Mr Freeman approaches the American public somewhat in the spirit of a missionary, as if the American public had not been reading his books for twenty years. The first course is precisely adapted to an audience that had never heard of Mr. Freeman or of 'the English people in their three homes.' The thought is excessively diluted, but it is agreeably stated, and will prepare the neophyte very satisfactorily for the stronger meat of the second course. .. Mr. Freeman's comments and criticisms upon our political machinery and methods are always sagacious and worthy of consideration."—Nation, xxxvi. 40.

"Wherever buildings and ruins are wanting, Mr. Freeman's interest in a period seems to fall him. He greatly prefers stones to syllables. . . . The obvious answer to this criticism, of course, is that the original scope of each paper was antiquarian rather than literary."—Acad, xxiv. 2.

24. Some Impressions of the United States, Lon., 1883,

p. 8vo.

"His desire to be fair has led him to be so cautious that it is really often very difficult to get from his book a distinct idea of what his impressions were. . . His book is in part a labored attempt to show that we are more English than anything else. . . It is a very misleading kind of criticism. It is only by seeing how our life differs from English life that we get any clear idea about ourselves."—Nation. xxxvi. 494.

English life that we get any clear idea about ourselves."— Nation, xxxi, 494.

"He tells us that his book is the fruit of a six months' visit to the United States; and surely to have observed so carefully, to have accumulated so many facts in so short a time, must be looked upon as no ordinary performance. Nor is it his industry alone that deserves praise: In. Freeman desires to see the object fairly, and he reproduces the impression it makes upon him with much faithfulness; the result is that the likeness of Brother Jonathan which is accepted in England as exact is seen to be a mere caricature."—Spectair. "His general views, as regards his subject, are... not very clear or profound; and he sometimes enters on trains of reflection of a very ordinary and obvious kind, and expresses them in far from happy language. Nevertheless his work is, on the whole, good; his antiquarian knowledge is most valuable; he points out the true methods of studying history, if his ideal is scarcely possible to attain."

Frith, Miss I. Life of Giordano Bruno, the Nolan.

Revised by Moriz Carrière. (English and Foreign Philosophical Library.) Lon., 1887, cr. 8vo.

"However well meant, this work is not well executed. ... An uncritical reader will carry from its perusal a useful. working, dictionary-article view of the great Italian thinker. but, for scholars conversant with his work and times, the Life of Giordano Bruno has yet to be written."

—JOHN OWEN: Acad., xxxii. 181.

"The merit of the book is that to its writer the philosophy of Bruno is vital and full of attraction. ... Bruno's writings have been studied with scrupulous care, and in them the author has found a message for herself, and has succeeded in setting forth that message for others to hear and understand."—Ath. In 1840 he took his degree with a second class in Classics, and in 1842 he gained the Chancellor's prize for an English essay, and was elected Fellow of Exeter College. In 1844 he took deacon's orders in the Church of England. A fundamental change of views led to his abandonment of his fellowship and of a clerical life, and, being debarred by his orders from a profession, he devoted himself entirely to letters, contributing largely to Fraser's Magazine and to the Westminster Review. the former periodical be was for some time editor at a later period, resigning that office in 1871. "We have said more of the man than of the book; but this is the highest compliment that can be paid to a biography—that the author is forgotten, and only the man subjects given by his predecessors, that they may be said to be additions to the history of England. . . . The details are selected with judgment and taste, and thrown into a vivid and striking form by the powers of a fine imagination. The narrative moves slow; nor has Mr. Froude the rare gift of preserving the perfect unity of a great historical drama amidst great complexity of events and frequent shiftings of the scene. . . The book is greatly overloaded with long quotations from State Papers; but this arises less from a fault of literary judgment than from an exaggerated estimate of the historical and moral value of everything that proceeded from the government of Henry VIII. . . Mr. Froude has a great command of beautiful inagery, which, as might be expected, sometimes runs a little wild. The tone of his writing is sometimes runs a little wild. The tone of his writing is sometimes runs a little wild. The root of a good deal of the excellency of his work. . . . The extended religious experience and converse which Mr. Froude has gone through in the course of his devious theological career has given him a great advantage in depicting the various shades of religious sentiment and the various phases of religious party. . . . We doubt whether in this great qualification for portraying the phases of a complicated, various, and wavering religious movement, he has ever had a superior among historians. But Mr. Froude does not possess the same advantages in dealing with questions of politics, jurisprudence, or political economy, as in dealing with religious questions. . . . Mr. Froude seems to have thought that it would be an unsatisfactory result of all his laborious researches if they ended in furnishing him merely with a mass of new and interesting details illustrating the received view of the occurrences of the time, or even with some important modifications of that view in regard to questions of a secondary kind. Some great discovery must be made to reward adequately so much labour, and to satisfy the expectation raised by the opening of mines of documentary evidence hi

"It is an eminently readable book Of all Mr. Froude's high qualities as a historian, we should place picturesqueness first; his account of the Armada, for instance, is even finer than Mr. Motley's, and the chapters on the rebellions in Ireland are exceedingly graphic. Hardly interior to this, it inferior at all, is his power of grasping the essential ideas of the period of which he is treating, and placing them clearly and strongly before the reader . . . His powers of analysis, both of policy and character, are good, although less marked than the qualities already mentioned. . . While we do not think that Mr. Froude's place will be in the first rank of historians, we do not hesitate to pronounce this work an adequate and worthy history of that great period during which the change was made from Popery to Protestantism, and at the same time the English nation entered upon that career of enterprise and adventure, of thought and action, which conducted to the great revolutions and the maritime ascendency of the seventuenth eentury."—Nation, x. 323.

"The writer possesses many of the qualifications necessary to an historian of the first rank. With ample materials gathered and deciphered at the expense of time and labour which none can properly estimate who has not himself tried the process; with a power of graphic delineation, and a skill in the selection of such incidents as give completeness and interest to the narrative, with an insight into the characters that pass before him in the panoramic picture which prepares for a fair estimate of their capacity; with the patriotic feelings of an Englishman, the love of freedom natural to a Protestant, antipathy to despotism, spiritual as well as political, sympathy with man's intellectual and moral progress, the historian takes a high place among those whose reputation is destined to endure Mr. Froude is never dull or wearisome, though his history abounds in details. But in such matters differences of opinion are inevitable, and, as a rule, the tone of his sketch seems to us to be temperate and its candour undeniable. In general Mr. Froude's book has little enough of freshness either in its method of treating its subject or in the conclusions at which it arrives, so that we doubt whether it is likely to be singled out by the readers of a remoter future from among the many tributes to Cæsar and Cæsar-sism which our generation has produced."—Sat. "As Hamlet's father was sent by his unnatural brother to his grave with all his imperfections full upon him, so has Carlyle been recalled from his tomb by one who professes to have telt for him the love and veneration of a son, but who has performed by some marvellous perversion of judgment all that might have been looked for from his worst enemy. He (Carlyle) was a man of the most independent, honest character and of lofty thoughts, who would not for any worldly advantage abate one jot of his own standard of right and duty, essentially of a generous and kindly nature, a delightful companion, shining in society, a good son, a devoted brother, a really affectionate husband and friend, and the author of all those great contributions to English literature which have for so long placed him in the front rank of historians and essayists. This being so, why has every fault and weakness been traced with such loving insistence as to spare no ugly or repulsive detail?. Why need every splenetic and hasty remark of scorn or condemnation spoken or found in the letters or journals have been preserved and printed for the misguidance of posterity?. Why need the discomforts occasioned between him and his wife by what should have been a thoroughly useful and agreeable friendship be dwelt upon at such length and with so much zest?. Fullerton, Lady Georgiana Charlotte, [ante, vol. i., add., 1812-1885, b. at Tixull Hall, Staffordshire, Eng.; was the daughter of Lord Granville Levison Gower, afterwards first Earl Granville. Her early life was spent chiefly in Paris, where her father was ambassador. In 1833 she married Alexander George Fullerton, of Ballintoy Castle, County Antrim, Ireland, who joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1843, and was followed in 1846 by Lady Georgiana. After the death of her only son in 1854 she gave herself up entirely to religious and benevolent works, devoting the money pained by her books to philanthropic purposes. For biog, see Colering, H. "It would be hard to exaggerate Mrs. Furness's industry and faithfulness; and if we were to make any complaint about the book, it would be that lavish care and industry had made it almost too good "—Nation, xviii 412.

"This work supplies an undoubted want, and, we are happy to add, it supplies it in an admirable manner. . . . It is a credit to herself, to her sex, and to her nation. Properly considered, it is a most valuable contribution to true Shakespearian study, by the side of which much of what passes for Shakespearian lore is shown in its full worthless—uses."—Ath., No. 2446.

"Whe do not think we exaggerate when we say that no more effective and inestimable helps to real Shakerian criticism exist than the volumes ior which we are haply indebted to Mrs. Cowden Clarke and Mrs. Horace of Furness We welcome the newly-arrived one with the test that the coming of a fresh foolish phantasies that are perpetually issuing from the brains of ill-informed guess-mongers, to blow swey the foolish phantasies that are perpetually issuing from the brains of ill-informed guess-mongers, to blow strength and vigour into all crincisms that are genuine births of knowledge and of sound and healthful judgment."—J. has devoted himself during many years to Shakespearian studies, and has accumulated materials for the illustration of the poet's works unrivalled probably in value and extent by any similar collection in America. of Shakespeare: vol. i., Romeo and Juliet, Phila., 1871, imp. 8vo.

"That a new Variorum Shakespeare is wanted no one will be inclined to dispute. The last work of the kind ... appeared in 1821. In the half-century since then, Shakespearian studies have been carried on with constantly increasing activity. We have thus a Shakespearian literature wonderful for extent and variety. It is clearly time that some one should go through it, and present its substance in a condensed and acceptable form. This is the task—opus vere operosum—which Mr Furness has undertaken. In deciding what to admit the editor has exercised a liberal judgment. He has preferred, with reason, to erro nthe side of fulness rather than of defect.

One aim of his work was to present a history of Shakespearian interpretation, and for this it was necessary that imperfect or erroneous views should appear in it as well as the correct. From a variety of indications we are satisfied that his self-imposed task has been executed with conscientious and unwearied fidelity "—Nation, xii. 307.

"So much has been done in the way of discovery and correction since the appearance of Malone's edition in 1821, that, if the American editor maintains throughout the work the spirit and industry which he has displayed in his first volume, he will furnish a new reference Shakespeare that, in bookseller's phrase, no library should be without."—Spectator, xiiv. 801.

"The present volumes abound in special difficulties of their own, not the least of which spring from the extraordinary number and extent of the discussions upon so many points connected with the play. A glance at the bibliography of 'Hamlet,' printed at the end of the second volume, would strike the nervelessness of despair into any editor not fortified by the intensest love of the author and of the work. . . "In what is called 'The Variorum Edition of Shakespeare,' America has the honour of having produced the very best and most complete edition, so far as it has gone, to be desired. The editor... combines with the patience and accuracy of the textual scholar an industry which has overlooked nothing of value that has been written about Shakespeare by the best German and French as well

8. The Pope and the King: the War between Church and State in Italy, Lon., 1879, 2 vols. 8vo.

"His first volume is the best account of Modern Italian history which exists in English. It is written with the full knowledge of European politics which alone can make the subject intelligible... The second part of Mr. (fallenga's book is unworthy of being appended to the first. The final reflections on the political future of Italy are interesting and suggestive; but, like most criticisms of modern politics, they are strong only in destruction."—M. CREIGHTON: Acad, xv. 385. "For the most part his book is a long distribe against the Italian people for their misuse of the power and liberty they have attained... These volumes afford abundant proof that years have robbed their author of none of his cunning. Every page displays keen observation and vigorous thought: the writer often provokes opposition, but never induces weariness."—Speciator, 1xi. 59.

"That which strikes us as most noteworthy in this important contribution to English history is the clearness with which the book, as a whole, brings out a fact less habitually insisted upon than the constitutional significance of the Parliamentary struggles of those times. As the downfall of the personal authority of James I had been due to the central and typical scheme of his foreign policy, so the failure of the foreign policy of Buckingham and Charles I. was an important element in the want of confidence which was the real cause of the overthrow of the Stuart monarchy."—Sai Rev., xxxix 693.

"What makes him pre-eminently trustworthy as an authority is that he abstains from treating events and the actors in them from any particular point of view; that, at the risk of giving his marrative an occasionally disjointed appearance, he enables the reader to see different courses of events (Scotch, for instance, and English) in progress side by side, now converging, and now intersecting, and that in the deed he never forgets the nature of the doer, be he King Charles or King Pym."—Sal. "Mr. Garnett has given a singularly good account of Carlyle, man and work.... We do not know that anything important to be known in Carlyle's blography is here omitted, while his successive works meet with criticism which is always more or less sympathetic and discriminating Mr. Garnett is most emphatically right in insisting on the altogether incalculable importance of Carlyle as an ethical influence on the last half of the nineteenth century.'—Sac. "Although the treatise . . . is primarily a biography, and a very full and minute one, and although it is written with the reverential admiration of children rather than with the reverential admiration of children rather than from the point of view of a dispassionate and critical historian, it is also virtually a history of the anti-slavery struggle . . . It cannot be adequately dealt with till the later volumes are before us. . All that need now be done is to call attention to the mass of valuable materials which the biographers of Garrison have provided for historical inquirers. . . . Nearly all appear in print for the first time. Many relate to forgotten controversies, others serve chiefly to filustrate Garrison's character and that of his fellowworkers. But there are also many which throw a full and clear light on the condition of America, and especially of New England, five or six decades back."—James Bryce: Historical Review, No. 1.

Gaskell, Mrs. Elizabeth Cleghorn, 1865, [ante, vol. i., add.,] b in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, was not, as stated ante, vol. 1., Miss Stromkin, but was the daughter of William Stevenson, (q. v., ante, vol. ii,) who at the time of her birth was keeper of the records to the treasury. Her mother having died in giving her birth, she was brought up by her aunt, Mrs. Lumb, at the village of Knutsford, in Cheshire,—the "Cranford" of her popular story of that name. After spending two years at a school at Stratford-on-Avon, she lived with her father till his death in 1829, and atterwards at Knutsford, till her marriage in 1832 to Rev. William Gaskell, a Unitarian minister of Manchester. Some years later she turned her attention to writing, and contributed an account of Clopton Hall to William Howitt's Remarkable Places, and some short stories to the People's Journal. After the publication of Mary Barton she visited London and made the acquaintance of Dickens and other literary men, and became a contributor to llousehold Words. During the cotton famine in 1862 Mrs. Gaskell started sewing-schools for the female mill-hands, thus inaugurating a system of relief which was atterwards publicly adopted and proved of great benefit. death took place suddenly, of heart-disease, while staying at a house in Hampshire which she had recently bought as a present for her husband. Her novel Wives and Daughters, which was coming out at the time in serial form, was left unfinished. The following list of her works includes those mentioned ante, vol. i, where dates, dec., are not given: 1. Mary Barton: a Tale of Manchester Lafe, Lon., 1848, 2 vols. p. 800. Anon. (The 5th ed., 1854, contains Two Lectures on the Lancashire Dialect, by Rev. William Gaskell.) 2. The Moorland Cottage. by Rev. William Gaskell.) 2. The Moorland Cottage. very high place among those who are comparatively unambitious in their efforts, and who, having a just measure of their own powers, succeed perfectly in what they undertake. She never attempted high flights, but pursued her way steadily and surely at a moderate elevation. Her style has not the magnificent reach of her friend Charlotte Brontë: it is homely, as suited her subjects. It was natural that art such as hers, working earnestly within a definite field, without straining to get beyond it, and never wasting its strength against the precipices, should become more perfect as she went on. To the last she was best known as the authorese of Mary Barton. But in her later novels, 'Sylvia's Lovers' and 'Wives and Daughters,' in which she left the manufacturing towns behind her and essayed to describe less oppressive and painful conditions of life, though she cannot be said to have improved upon the completeness and vividess of her separate portraits, she showed greater art in the management of her story. Her last novel, 'Wives and Daughters,' though she did not live to write the concluding chapters, is in many respects the most mature, as it is, with the exception, perhaps, of Cranford, the most delightful, of her works."—W. "It is a new story, which it was impossible to tell even a few years ago with anything like accuracy, simply because the original evidences had not been made sufficiently accessible, or comprehensively catalogued in true chronological order. But, although the author is a monk, and dedicates his work to Pope Leo XIII., by whom, it appears, he was induced to undertake it, he need fear no contradiction hereafter on the main point here revealed. The old scandals, universally discredited at the time, and believed in by a later generation only through prejudice and ignorance, are now dispelled forever, and no candid Protosta estant will ever think of reviving them."—James Gaird-Ner: Acad., xxxiii. 125. Gaster, M., Ph.D. Hohester Lectures on Greeko-

Geddes, James. The History of the Administration of John de Witt, Grand Pensionary of Holland: vol. i., 1623-1654, Lon., 1879, 8vo.

"If Mr. Geddes has been fired by the honourable ambition of worthly carrying on the thread of Mr. Motley's labours, the conception of the 'History of the Administration of John de Witt' is not the less its author's own, and his grasp of the general European history of the times with which he deals is, to say the least, as vigorous as that exhibited in the rather disappointing second volume of the 'Lite and Death of John of Barneveld.' We cannot, however, suppress a wish that Mr. Geddes had not thought it necessary to imitate Mr. Motley—or rather, perhaps, the inimitable old master who is primarily responsible for the fashion to which we refer—in adopting the familiarly picturesque style of historical composition. . For English readers this volume is likely to possess a unique interest, centring in its narrative of what may assuredly be termed the strangest diplomatic negotiation into which this country has ever entered with a foreign power. We do not know whither else to turn for so plain and succinct an account as that furnished in Mr. Geddes's pages of the great Protestant and Republican scheme of an Anglo-Dutch coalition."—Sat Rev. xlix. 283

"We feel, with Mr. Geddes, that if there had been a Boswell by De Witt's 'side, or a chatty French memorrariter, we should have seen it all very differently.' As there was not, we think it a pity that so good a writer should have wasted his time on such an unprofitable subject "—Spectator, lini 336.

"It is Mr Gelkie's plan to blend in one great result the special evidences which have been adduced by geologists and archeologists to prove the great antiquity of our race. The larger part of the work is naturally devoted to the phenomena of glacial action, as shown by a careful study of the deposits. . . . The general agreement between these eminent palæontologists may be taken by the public at large as a sufficient testimony to the solidity of the basis on which has been built up the comparatively recent science of prehistoric archeology, and to the trustworthiness both of the materials and the methods which have been combined to make up the fabric."—Sat. new ed., 1884.

"Mr. George endeavors to show that the cause, or principal cause, of poverty and wretchedness in the midst of wealth and abundance in the world is the private ownership of land, whereby a few persons are enabled to exact from the many a rental for the use of something which is limited in quantity and indispensable to the human race.

Although we have to consider Mr. George's positions essentially unsound, we find many admirable passages, and a notable spirit of candor pervading his work. The style is for the most part engaging, and often eloquent. So far from being a work of communistic tendencies, the reader will find in it arguments to overthrow nearly all the communist theories of the present day."—Naturn, xxxi. 65, 117.

Question: what it is, and how only it can be settled, Lon., 1883, 12mo. 6. Social Problems, Chic., N. York, and Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"This is 'Progress and Poverty' over again, with less argument and more passion, less political economy and more tirade and bombast. We do not underestimate the evils which Mr. George depicts, but his remedy for them is as worthless and futile as it would be atrocious if it could be carried into execution. . . In his present work he advocates woman suffrage, and frankly avows socialistic views. . . Mixed up with all his absurdities there are dashes of sturdy good sense in all Mr. George's writings. . . Barring a few slight blemishes of diction, (will' for 'shall,' etc.,) his style is in every respect admirable. His method of developing a subject greatly resembles that of Herbert Spencer: . . but Mr. George's style is fresher and more brilliant."—Nation. xxxviii 237, and xxxix 294.

"Throughout his book there runs a vein of cheerful optimism; of the cynicism and scepticism which mark so many of the revolutionary class there is scarcely a trace. Nor can we agree with those who think that Mr George's pet idea, which here reappears, of the nationalization of land by the confiscation of rent, is a dangerous one. In a country like ours such a proposal is so extravagant and unpractical that it may be dismissed as harmless. The real danger seems to be . . . that the colossal blunder of Mr George may hide from us the valuable truths or suggestions of truth that may undoubtedly be found in the book."—Acad., xxv. 87.

"Mr. George is the master of a clear and vigorous style, and although he looks almost exclusively at the darker side of things, although his denunciations of modern society are unduly severe, his facts often unfairly stated, and his deductions generally absurd, many of his observations are not without warrant; and it is perhaps well that we should be reminded, even in overstrained language, that our social system is not perfect, and that some momentous social system is not perf

4. For Lack of Gold, Lon., 1871, 3 vols.; new ed.,

"Mr. Gibbon has committed the same mistake in 'For Lack of Gold' which spoilt the thoroughness of 'Robin Gray,' that is, he has begun with a sweet and tender idyl, and has suffered himself to wander off into unlikely and and has suffered himself to wander off into unlikely and unreal sensationalism. He evidently missperehends both his own powers and the taste of the more cultivated class of readers, whom he could better interest than the coarser kind, and, instead of working out his vein of pure ore, goes into the manufacture of a base and spurious metal, which is not refined enough for the best judges and not showy enough for the worst."—Sat. "Mr Gilbert seems to have spent some time in consult-ing the public records of Ferrara, and especially those which have reference to the life and times of Lucrezia which have reference to the life and times of Lucrezia Borgia; and his labour has resulted in a curious picture of the city as it was between three and four centuries ago, and a very interesting study of the character of a princess who has hitherto found but few champions. The idea originally thrown out by Mr Roscoe, in his 'Dissertation on the Character of Lucretia Borgia,' has been fully worked out by Mr. Gilbert, who has at least succeeded in proving that the beautiful toxicologist of the stage has very little in common with the Lucrezia Borgia of history."—Sal. Legion; or, The Modern Demoniae, Lon., 1882, p. 8vo. "He is a story-teller sui generis, with a very peculiar tendency towards minute analysis of morbid and exceptional mental processes. Yet he never seems to analyze any mood or mental condition for its own sake simply; and we are therefore compelled to see in him the professed moralist with a leaning towards hard psychological phenomena, in which he finds a ready justification for his didactic purpose. . The fusing power is what Mr. Gilbert is most lacking in. He sees his whole subject clearly enough from the pseudo-scientific ground, but he does not so see it from the elevated table-land of the imagination . . All Mr. Gilbert's books are full of exquisite pictures and individual points, which are vastly unlike those found in the books of any one else."—Contemp. Rev., xii. 437-444.

Gilbert, William Schwenck, son of William Gilbert, supra; b. 1836, in London, and educated at King's College, London; took his degree at the London University; was a clerk in the Education Office 1857-62, and was called to the bar in 1864, but practised very little. He has contributed largely to periodicals, but is best known by his plays, of which Sweethearts (1874) and Engaged (1877) have been the most successful, and by the light operas of which he has furnished the libretti to the music of Sir Arthur Sullivan. 1. edited by his widow, with the assistance of W. M. Rossetti.) Enlarged Edition, with Additional Letters and a Memoir of the Author, 1880.

"In the very interesting Life before us tardy justice has at last been done to the memory of one whose natural gifts qualified him apparently to rank amongst the greatest of English artists. Mr Glichrists book both tells the singular story of Blake's life, for the first time, with fulness and with a judgment which is rarely at fault, and by its numerous and faithful filustrations enables the reader more or less to make acquaintance with the artist. The book is written in a clear, vigorous, unconventional style, it is as amusing as a romance, and we have few recent Lives in which the facts have been more carefully collected, presented with less parade, or arranged in such lucid order. The catalogue of drawings which has been added by Mr. William Rossetti is a model of what is an indispensable adjunct to an artist's life."—Sat Rev., xvi. 650.

"It is not, perhaps, so generally interesting as his previous work, the very remarkable "Myths and Songs from the South Pacific,"—a collection of antiquities, to use the words of Professor Max Müller, 'showing us, far better than any stone weapons or stone idols, the growth of the human mind during a period which as yet is full of the most perplexing problems to the psychologist, the historian, and the theologian.' The 'Historical Sketches' deal with the sweet realities more than with the neturesque fictions the rough realities more than with the picturesque fictions of savage life, and the work is somewhat monotonous in of savage life, and the work is somewhat monotonous in its records of sacrifices to fierce gods, its legends of inter-necine feuds, and its chromeles of cannibalism. But the testimony it bears has the great merit of being quite trust-worthy, and Mr. Gill has done very good service by placing on record the heathenish traditions which must before long fade from the memories of the Christian descendants of the fierce islanders to whom they relate."—Sat. Rev., 1, 449 of the nerce islanders to which are small readers as its predecessor. If that told us what the untrained human mind thinks about the universe and its government, this one shows us what human life and society can be where each man does that which is right in his own eyes."—A. "The book is well timed and well executed, and, so far as we have been able to test it, is thoroughly trustworthy in its summary of facts, and the most complete compendium of them yet published. The writer, however, has not been content to give us a mere collection of facts, but has let us know very clearly the result of his studies on his own mind, and his reasons for arriving at that result,—which is, that profit sharing is already proved to be, if not the very best, yet certainly 'one of the most promising methods of securing the peaceful and fruitful union of the productive forces of modorn industry.'... We believe he is right."—Spectator, ixii. 718.

Preface.

"There is great inequality in Mr Gladstone's execution of his undertaking. On some parts of it he has bestowed the greatest pains, and his views are undoubtedly worthy of the deepest consideration, while on others he has apparently taken up the slight conjectures of others, and applied to them too small a share of the extraordinary powers of his own mind."—Sat. article that appeared in the Quarterly Review for January, 1875.)

"The real thing which Mr Gladstone objects to is not the doctrine that the Catholic faith on any disputed point of pure theology may be ascertained from a declaration (uttered under certain conditions) by the Pope, instead of the cumbrous machinery, used probably for the last time in 1870, of a group of hundreds of bishops summoned away for months from their dioceses to be caloied into voting straight; he is shocked at finding that English and Irish, French and American, German and Italian Catholics are to be bound in conscience to obey the orders of an Italian Court, in certain matters about which the Governments of their own countries give, or claim the power to give, contradictory orders."—W. "Mr Gledstone's skill and diligence have given us a biography of this extraordinary man which it is a positive pleasure to read. What his theological bias may be we do not care to inquire, only that he gives us plainly to understand that he admires Whitefield in spite of his Calvinism rather than in consequence of it. At any rate, he has favoured the world with a clear, spirited, and judicious life of one whose memory will ever be honoured by those who trace back to him and to men like-minded with him the first germs of that spiritual revival in England which, with all its drawbacks, has proved the source of happiness to thousands, and has powerfully affected for good our national hie and character."—Sad. King of Italy, Lon. and N. York, 1879, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The writer's admiration for the truly kingly qualities of Victor Emmanuel amounts almost to the loyalty of a subject, which an evidently long residence in Italy has fostered... The permanent value of this biography lies in its extracts from the chief Italian memoirs on the period under survey.... while its interest is secured by a good assortment of anecdotes."—Nation, xxix 2.31

"He has succeeded in compressing into the limits of two very handly volumes all the principal events of the public life of the late King of Italy... His work is very far from being dull."—Speciator, ill. 1233.

The Religious History of Ireland, Primitive, Papal, and Protestant: including the Evangelical Missions, Catholic Agitations, and Church Progress of the Last Half-Century, Lon., 1873, 8vo.

"The book is disfigured throughout by the practice of filling the pages with scraps from other writers.... Mr. Godkin treats the three rival communions with praiseworthy impartiality, and is ready to do justice to good and zealous men in all three alike... He is strong in behalf of the National system and the Queen's Colleges... Mr. Godkin is much better employed in speaking of these later matters, which he has clearly looked at with much care, than in puzzling his brain about Cuthites and Fir-Bolgs."—Nat. Rev. xxxvi. 411.

"Mr. Godkin's book is in no wise to be relied on....

The aim of the work is not historical at all, but political and partisan."—James Gairdner: Acad., v. 30.

"Technically speaking, Mr. Gosse's 'New Poems' might be classed as idyls and lyrics; but the lyrical element preponderates. His songs, as a rule, are the expression of emotion rather than of passion . It is one great charm of these verses that they seem to come to the poet uncalled, to be the natural and necessary expression of his mood. Yet natural as they are—so natural that, granted the intensity of emotion, the musical utterance follows like a logical conclusion—the artistic expression is never neg lected "—Sat Rev., xiviii. 637.

"The lectures published in this volume were delivered by Mr. Gosse as Clark Lecturer of Trinty College, Cambridge, . . and they also have been read before several academic audiences in America. Mr Gosse expresses the hope that he has been able to show that the classical movement was not a stupid decime into dulness, but that it was an absolute necessity if English poetry was to exist, that a period of executive severity and attention to form should succeed the hysterical riot of the Jacobeans' The process by which this conclusion is reached will interest every reader of poetry. . . He has brought much to light that has been neglected hitherto, he abounds with suggestions, and when for a moment he is allured from his main line of argument by some poetic memory or illustra-

Gould, John, F R.S., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804-1881. The catalogue of scientific papers compiled by the Royal Society shows that up to 1873 there had been two hundred and twenty-nine contributed by Gould, and this number was afterwards considerably increased. his vast collection of birds and mammals, the Australian birds are in the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, and the humming-birds and Australian mammals in the South Kensington Museum. His books, which include more than forty folio volumes, now command enhanced prices for the beauty of their illustrations as well as for the value of the text. Most of them were origiduct of the Spiritual Life, Lon., 1888, 2 vols. or Svo.

(25 parts) imp. fol. In the final volume the author writes in reference to the illustrations in his works,-

"Many of the public are quite unaware how the colouring of these large plates has been accomplished, and not a few believe that they are produced by some mechanical process, or by chromo-lithography. This, however, is not the case; every sky with its varied tints, and every feather of each bird, were coloured by hand; and when it is considered that nearly two hundred and eighty thousand illustrations in the present work have been so treated, it will cause some astonishment to those who give the subject a thought."

Notices of Mr. Baring-Gould's novels:

Notices of Mr. Baring-Gould's novels:

"Wild, singular, extraordinary, as the conceptions and combinations of the author of 'Mehalah' are, they are almost if not entirely removed from the realm of imagination. It is on this fact, as we believe, that their value and their chance of endurance as literature rest. The stories of English rural life which have followed 'Mehalah' form each in its way bits of human history, studies of eccentric development, scenes from the comedy of unsophisticated life, which have an interest different from what we accord to the flights of more exclusively imaginative writers."—Sat. Rev., lxiv 667.

"Of our eight or ten living novelists of merit, few have greater ability than Mr Baring-Gould. His characters are boid and forcible figures, his wit is as ready as his figures of speech are apt. He has a powerful imagination, and is quaintly fanciful. When he describes a storm one can see his trees breaking in the gale. So enormous and accurate is his general information that there is no trade or profession with which he does not seem to be familiar. So far as scientific knowlege is concerned, he is obviously better equipped than any contemporary writer of faction. Yet one rises from his books with a feeling of repulsion, or at least with the glad conviction that his Ignoble views of life are as untrue as the characters who illustrate them. Here is a melancholy case of a novelist, not only clever but sincere, undone by want of sympathy."—J. M. Barrie: Contemporary Rev., February, 1890.

"I propose in the following pages to give the chief conclusions reached by modern science in the central questions of religion, morals, and society,—to state, in a word, the general creed of science, and as the scientific faith may still be fallible, or of unequal degrees of credit, I propose, in the second place, to offer some comments and criticisms on some of its more doubtful articles, with a view to their reconsideration or revision."—Author's Preface.

"This volume shows in a very able as well as very interesting manner the poverty of the higher philosophy of the men of physical science, and the absolute need for something better than they can give us as the supplement of their own science, which is so excellent in itself. But it is a pity that the author, in his desire for maintaining close sympathy with the men of science, should have been so terribly afraid of being taken for a Christian."—Spectator, liv. 1984. liv. 1194

Political Aspects, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"With terrific power he depicts the purgatorial pains of poverty... What are his remedies? They are twofold,—general and special. The most comprehensive prescription is to 'try and see what justice, the great and almost the only social virtue, is, and where it lies.'... Unlike so many who have looked into the depths of the social abyss, he has not been seized with an intellectual vertigo. He has the moral earnestness without the bogus value-theory of Mars; the burning eloquence without the glaring fallacies of Henry George... One feels that Prof. Graham may be the ablest living advocate of socialism; one wishes that he were less of an advocate and more of a judge."—

1822-1885, b. at Point Pleasant, Clermont Co., O.; graduated at the U.S. Military Academy 1843; served as lieutenant in the Mexican war 1845-47; was promoted captain in 1853, but resigned his commission in 1854, and settled in Missouri; served in the civil war as colonel, brigadier-general, and major-general of volunteers 1861 -63, and was then commissioned as major-general in the regular army; commissioned as lieutenant-general in 1864, with the command of all the armies, and as general 1866. He was President of the United States 1869-1877, and was restored to his rank as general and placed on the retired list shortly before his death. He died at Mount McGregor, near Saratoga, and was buried in Riverside Park, N.Y., the funeral cortége being the most imposing ever witnessed in America. "Looked at simply as material for the American historical magnum opus of the future, probably nothing will be reckoned more important, certainly nothing can be more interesting on the military side, than this plain narrative, by a plain, but observant, veracious, and resolutely impartial, man. . . . General Grant writes a simple, American-Saxon style."—Spectator, lix. 392.
"It cannot be too carefully remembered . . . that the chief value of the book must be in the revelation of Grant's own character, feelings, judgments, and modes of thinking. It is both valuable and interesting as making us know him better than we knew him before; but, regarded as history, all the circumstances under which it was written precluded the possibility of that critical testing of memory and comparison of voluminous documents without which not even so prominent an actor on the world's stage can safely claim to write the history of his own time."—Nation, xilii. 12.

"His biographer is one familiar with him from the early days of each, and was selected by him as his literary executor. He has written like a man full of his subject and forgetful of himself, and the result is a volume [vol i,] appreciative, unaffected, and in entirely good taste. It is so faithful a delineation of a great intellect and a noble character that a thoughtful reader will seem to himself rather to recognize one whom he had known of old than to make acquaintance with him for the first time. As one who was honoured by Hamilton's friendship, I may be permitted to bear witness that it is a faithful portrait of one who, of all the men whom I have met, appears to me to have most eminently combined depth and largeness of intellect with elevated aspirations and the simplicity of a child"—AUBREY DE VERE: Arad., axiii 179, 197.

"The hearty gratitude of all who can appreciate things lovely and of good report is due to Mr Graves for this simple, discriminating, and sympathetic memoir of one who was in the best and noblest sense of the term a great man."—Speciator, 1xii 828.

"Not since Mr. Green's death has any contribution to historical literature appeared in England which bears more unmistakably the stamp of genius than does this remarkable monograph... The real value of this book is to be sought not in the charn of a brilliant style, or the surprising width of the knowledge it exhibits, or the vividness of the portraiture, or the subtlety with which some legal and constitutional questions are handled, but in the masterly manner in which the main object has been kept in view from first to last, and, though nothing in the history of his reign has been surred over, everything has been subordinated to the setting forth the statesmanship of the king."—Ath., No. 3171.

Green, John Richard, M.A., LL.D., 1837-1883, b. at Oxford, Eng.; educated at Magdalen College School and at Jesus College, Oxford, and while an undergraduate published some papers in a local journal on Oxford in the eighteenth century. In 1860 he took his degree and was ordained. He became curate of St. Barnabas, King's Square, E.C., London, and was afterwards vicar of St. Philip's, Stepney. His health, always delicate, was seriously impaired by the labors of an East London parish, and particularly by his exertions during the cholera outbreak of 1867, and this fact, together with intellectual difficulties in regard to his position, led him to resign his parish for literary occupation. In 1868 he was made librarian to the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth. For some years he wrote regularly for the Saturday Review, and contributed to other periodicals. His two latest works were written in the midst of a hopeless struggle with consumption. 1. A Short History of the English People: with Maps and Tables, Lon., 1874, p. (Over thirty thousand copies were sold in the first year.)

svo. (Over thirty thousand copies were sold in the first year.)

"A single volume of the modest dimensions and unpretending appearance of a school-book, but the wealth of material, of learning, thought, and fancy which the author has lavished upon it might easily have supplied a stately library work of some eight or ten volumes. . . . Some previous knowledge, some time and attention, may be required rightly to appreciate the extent of Mr. Green's historical scholarship, or the depth and thoughtfulness of his comments on historical events; but the most indolent reader can hardly take it up without finding that he has lighted upon a book which is never commonplace and never dull. . . If Mr. Green's style has a fault, it is the rather unusual one of excess of brilliancy. At times we are carried away with its passionate earnestness or fascinated by its poetry and tender feeling, but at other times we begin to wish for repose, and that the author would take things coolly. . . . The value of his book lies above all in the power it shows of conceiving a period as a whole, of tracing the causes and results of events, and of following the great currents of thought."—Sal. Rev., xxxix.51.

"What he seems to profess, and what we think he makes good, is to have acquired all the newest knowledge upon a very large section of history, and to tell what he knows in such a style that every one may read it with little effort, and with such an arrangement, in many points new as well as ingenious, that it may be readily grasped and retained."—Ath., No. 2471.

"The secret of this extraordinary success it is not difficult to divine. Mr. Green's style is eminently readable and attractive. A lively imagination, not always under the most rigid control, imparts its own colours to the dry details of history, where a more scrupulous or conscientions writer would have wearied himself, and fatigued his readers, unwilling to venture beyond the arid region of facts.

If in some parts of his work we trace the conscientious study and examination of original authorities, in others he has trusted exclusively to recondary sources, attempting little more than a reproduction, after his own fashion, without exercising much independent judgment, and not always with rigid accuracy, of the opinions and conclusions of his predecessors."—J. S. Brewer: Quarterly Review, cxil. 285. Review, cxli. 285.

New edition, 130th-135th thousand, thoroughly revised, (by the author's widow,) 1888, or. 8vo.

"Many interpolations have been made in Mr. Green's text without any mark to distinguish them from his own work, many of his statements of fact, and even some of the opinions he expressed, have been modified or completely altered, and several alterations have been made in arrangement. In almost every case the book has been improved by this revision."—Sat. Rev., 1xv. 148.

Revolution, 1660-1688. Vol. iv., The Revolution, 1681-160: Modern England, 1760-1815.

"Though the materials of the earlier book [the "Short History of the English People"] have been woven into it, and though we recognize many of the most brilliant passages as old friends, still the arrangement is so altered, and the amount of fresh matter is so large, that it is substantially a new work. Almost the whole of the constitutional part has been rewritten in accordance with the views of Professor Stubbs. Moreover, he has to some extent clipped the wings of his imagination, which in the earlier work sometimes took rather lofty flights. In short, the new book, while retaining the life and sparkle of its predecessor, is better proportioned, calmer in tone, and altogether a more ripe and complete piece of work. Mr Green's belief in the rights of conscience is so strong that he can give due meed of admiration alike to the Protestant martyrs and confessors under Elizabeth; but it is at the same time neither with Protestant nor Romanist that his own sympathies lie. His heart is with the men who may be looked upon as the spiritual ancestors of the "advanced thinkers' of our own day,—with the group of scholars of the "New Learning," among whom Colet, Eramus, and More stand pre-eminent. The care and pains with which Mr. Green has traced the various currents of religious thought can hardly be too highly praised. Taking a general survey of the four volumes, we should be inclined to say that Mr Green is at his best as an instorian of mediæval times. No man can be equally in sympathy with all centuries, and, on the whole, the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries form the period with which Mr Green has least in common,"—Scd. Rev. xliv. 44, 745, 813; xlv 661; 1 214.

"Mr. Green has recovered the lost art of historical narration. This is his peculiar title to fame, and it is one which no contemporary English or American writer shares with him. . Impartial critics must, in estimating the causes of Mr Green's success, add that he

"Though this book cannot be expected to be as popular as the 'Short History,'—for the average man is l'kely to shrink from a whole volume on what Canon Stubbs still permits him to call the Heptarchy,—we believe that students will rate it as high as if not indeed higher than, any of Mr. Green's former works."—Sat. Rev., Itil 896.

"His present book is a piece of real original research. We do not say that it probes very deep into the fundamental question. As far as scholarship goes, it cannot compare with Mr. Elton's profoundly learned and broadly scientific work just published, which deals with much the same period; but looking at it as an essay written wholly within the narrow bounds of Mr. Freeman's Teutonic school, and based almost entirely upon the documentary evidence, it deserves high praise for its thoroughness and its general ability. . . . Indeed, two-thirds of the book may be accepted gratefully, without any reservation, by historians of every school, as a valuable contribution to the clearing up of perhaps the darkest period in our whole annals."—GRANT ALLEN: Accd., xxi. 111.

"It is difficult to criticise a book which we have no opportunity of judging as a whole It follows as a matter of course that this volume cannot be placed upon the same level with 'The Making of England.' But we can see that there were materials here that might have made it as successful, and would probably have made it even more popular than the previous one. As it stands, it is necessarily open to criticism upon many points."—Sat. Rev., lvi.

"The most able and remarkable contribution to ethical science which has appeared in our country since the publication of Professor Sidgwick's 'Methods of Ethics.' . . . It is the work of a mind of great power, although difficult to read in a measure far exceeding what is rendered necessary by the views of the writer and the subjects of which he treats."—Spectator, lvi 1283, 1316.
"The simplicity and lucidity of the style are especially admirable when the complexity of much of the subject-matter is considered; the stream of argument is almost everywhere as clear as it is deep. From the entangled confusion, the Germanized jargon, the epigrammatic paradox, which render some metaphysical works insufferable, this treatise is entirely free. . No one interested in the analysis of the capacities of the human soul is likely to read this book without genuine intellectual delight"—Ennest Myers. Acad, xxiv. 205.

"Of the four parts into which the work is . . . divided, the first . . . is a literal compilation (with brief résumés) from Russian official books on the recruiting, organization, armament, administration, and tactics of the army; the third, . . a short sketch of the campaign in Armenia, based on no personal observation by the author; and the fourth, . . . on the defence and attack of fortified positions, interesting only to specialists; the second part, . . . on the campaign in Bulgaria, forms the main portion of the whole, the most valuable to the general public, as it is the most extensive and interesting."—Nation, xxix, 227.

"One of the most important contributions to military history which have appeared for many years. . . The book, as Lieutenant Greene admits,—and as perhaps was only natural from the kind reception he received,—has a bias towards the Russian side, a stronger bias, indeed, than the writer is aware of, but the aim at impartiality is as clear as the spirit of accuracy and the painstaking ability which have been brought to bear on the compilation."—

"They have the charm of familiarity, and occasionally something of the tedium of personal affairs and the limitation of view within the family horizon natural to such epistles. . . Very little is to be found in regard to art, or books, or famous persons. little more of terseness and dramatic force in his dialogue, and a little more of net result, even though it were only the net result deduced by a powerfully preposessed mind, from the discussions, this book would have been not only thoughtful, but exceedingly likely to contribute greatly to form the convictions of an age to which conviction is greatly wanting."—Spectator, ili. 50.

of Virginia to the Reconstruction of the Union, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Greg's history falls into three main divisions, or at least there are three successive portions of his subject which stand out conspicuously: (1) The early history of the New England Puritans; (2) the War of Independence, and (3) the War of Secession. On each of these matters he is an earnest partisan. Mr Greg detests and condemns New England Puritans, American rebels, Northern abolitionists and their allies. . . . Every character, every incident, is so dealt with as to illustrate the righteousness of one cause, the unrighteousness of the other . . . It is the more to be regretted that Mr. Greg should have chosen to write a partisan pamphlet instead of a history, because he has gifts which might have fitted him to play the better part. He sees his subject as a whole clearly and comprehensively; his style, though at times disfigured by rather vague rhetoric, is for the most part lucid and effective; his arrangement and grouping of incidents methodical; his narrative concise."—J. A. Doyle: Acad., xxxi. 267

"After half a volume of it, the reader who does not begin as a bilind partisan finds himself sympathizing with the victims of all this scolding, even though he is naturally inclined to lean to Mr. Greg's own side . . The statesmanship, the wisdom, the culture, the valour, the chivalry, the lofty refined courtesy of the South are insisted on till one longs for the suppression of these immaculate creatures."—Sal. Rev., Ixili. 421.

"It does not contain a particle of original research; it does not bring to light a single document, letter, note or order. . . Its animus is mischievous,—to arouse ill-feeling between America and England, and awaken resentments between the North and the South. . . One would suppose that a novelist writing a history would at least make it entertaining; but there is not a picturesque description, a graphic narration, a fine personal characterization, in the two volumes."—Nation. xivi. 140.

Pictorial Satires, and Popular Caricatures of the Times, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"A history not of facts pure and simple, but of popular opinion on matters political, as it showed itself in contemporary English satirical prints. ... Extraordinarily interesting as Mr Grego's book is, attractive and extremely amusing as are its hundreds of illustrations, we must not expect from them the truth, or all the truth, and nothing but the truth."—Ath., No 3080.

"It is rather a collection of election carleatures, and anecdotes of striking incidents in some famous elections, than a connected history. ... In spite of its somewhat irritating faults, the book is interesting and amusing."—Speciator, 1x. 234.

"His sketches of character are sometimes almost worthy of 8t. Simon, whom he had probably studied with care, and they are the more valuable, though they may be less superficially consistent, because he often describes the same person more than once on varying occasions and in different moods of his own mind."—Sal. "The completion of Mr. Greville's Journals is a considerable literary event. From first to last they cover a period of forty years; and few English memoirs have been so coplous, so exact, so well informed, or so incisive. In some respects this instalment lags behind the others. There are but few stories. . . . There are fewer portraits. . . . There is little scaudal, and the pages are almost exclusively occupied with political events. . . On the other hand, these volumes bring us within reach of our own times, and what they lose in piquancy they gain in personal interest. . . This record is one of the most valuable and interesting political books of the century."—Acad., xxxi 69.
"He was peculiarly well informed on the most secret transactions of contemporary politics. He spared no pains in completing his information, recorded it with great freshness and perfect impartiality, and frequently revised his diaries. These characteristics, coupled with the brilliant portraits which he draws of his contemporaries, make his diaries the most important work of their kind of his generation."—Dict. of Nat Biop., xxiil. 158.

"After Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophical admiration, Lord Coleridge's polished though rather undiscriminating panegyric, Mr. Arnold's cautious appreciation, and Mr. Irving's self-advertising praise, it was, perhaps, well that some student of the people and institutions of the United States should raise his voice in criticism and censure. . . . The voice of criticism, however, if it is to serve for guidance or warning, must proceed from accurate knowledge and impartial views. Of these two indispensable qualifications Sir Lepel Griffin possesses neither the one nor the other."—Spectator, 1vii. 1640.

"Mr. Griffis has given us a panoramic view of Japanese history, bringing into prominence many of the most important periods. "By his title, 'Echoes,' Mr. Grindon explains that he does not mean resemblances, such as are the basis of popular nomenclature or scientific classification. but, as he expresses it, 'resonances from things of another substance,' the action of which he illustrates, in his own style, 'by the tree in the ancient forest calling to the blossom on the hills, and the fern in the dale calling to the blossom on the beach.' These echoes or resonances he teaches us to apprehend in the general aspect and figure of plants, in their leaf, flower, bracts and calyces, stamens and pixtlis, fruit, seed, colour, and odours: ... and under whichsoever of these heads we test his principles and research, we shall find equal ground for satisfaction."—Sat. 2. Ca ira; or, Danton in the French Revolution: a Study, Bost., 1887, 12mo. Gronow, B. M. T The Angel with the Censer, and other Poems, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

Gronow, Capt. Rees Howell, 1794-1865, was educated at Eton, where he was intimate with Shelley; entered the army as ensign 1812; served in the Penin sular war 1813, and in the Waterloo campaign 1815, and retired 1821; lived for some years in London, and afterwards in Paris. 1. Reminiscences of Captain Gronow, formerly of the Grenadier Guards, and M.P. for Stafford: being Anecdotes of the Camp, the Court, and the Clubs at the Close of the Last War with France. Illust. Lon., 1862, p. 8vo.

"These Reminiscences, although the historical passages must be taken with many grains of salt, really bring back past times to us vividly and agreeably."—Sat. Rev., xiv. 80.

2. Recollections and Anecdotes: being a Second Series of Reminiscences of the Camp, the Court, and the Clubs,

Lon., 1863, p. 8vo.

"As regards composition and arrangement, at all events, his second series of Reminiscences is decidedly an improvement on the first; and if his store of original anecdote is less redundant, his facts have been more carefully verified and compressed."—Sat. Rev., xvi. 30.

3. Celebrities of London and Paris: being a Third Series of Reminiscences of the Camp, the Court, and the Clubs: containing a Correct Account of the Coup d'Etat, Lon., 1864, p. 8vo. 4. Captain Gronow's Last Recollections: being the Fourth Series of his Reminiscences and Aneodotes, Lon., 1866, 8vo. Posth. 5. The Reminiscences and Recollections of Captain Gronow: being Aneodotes of the Camp, Court, Clubs, and Society, 1810— 1860: with Portrait, Four Wood-Cuts, and Twenty Etched and Aquatint Illustrations from Contemporary Sources, by Joseph Grego; each in duplicate, one on plate paper by Joseph Grego; each in duplicate, one on plate paper, remarque proofs, the other on Whatman paper, coloured by hand; limited ed., Lon., 1888, 2 vols. r. 8vo.

"Gronow was not exactly a Tallemant des Réaux, but he had many of the qualities possessed by that prince of anecdote, and there is no more delightful reading than the pages in which he restores the society of seventy years ago, or those in which we can read of the glories of the Second Empire and its Court "—Sat. Rev., 1xvi. 622.

"When he relates his personal experiences, as in his accounts of the state of Paris in 1815, the condition of society in London in his own time, and the doings of the court of Napoleon III, his testimony is to be relied on, but his second-hand stories and ancedotes of persons whom he did not know are of little value."—Dret. of Nat. Groome, Francis Hindes. 1. In Gypsy Tents, Edin., 1880, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1881.

"Mr. Groome is exceptionally qualified to describe gypsies, having lived much among them and gained their confidence to a remarkable extent. His account of their manners and customs, therefore, is a valuable contribution to the materials on which the future historian must draw for a picture of their life and a summary of their opinions."—

"A gazetteer of Scotland at once accurate and full ought to have been in existence years ago. Mr. Groome has here supplied this unquestionable want"—Ath, No 3012.

"The number of places recorded is simply enormous, including hamlets, mansion-houses, and burns. . . . The information given is both most minute and meet varied."

"It is exceedingly readable,—more than readable, entertaining... The contrast between Mr. Grote's quiet, simple, and scholarly letters, full of the work he was upon or the public events of the day, and Mrs. Grote's somewhat strong-minded personal sallies and badinage, has something of the effect of horseradish sauce with roast beef. "A work of which British enterprise, British art and science, may well be proud, for all three have combined in the production of a book of travel in some respects almost unrivalled in the rich record of British exploration. almost unrivalled in the rich record of British exploration. Certainly the illustrations . . . have never been excelled, and seldom equalled, for accuracy and artistic finish, except in such classic works as those of the Bewicks and Gould. . . . The text of this delightful work—a joy alike to naturalist, traveller, and to the ordinary reader—is, generally speaking, quite worthy of its splendid embellishments."—A. H Keane: Acad, xxxi. 51.

"It is a model work of travel."—Ath, No. 3119.

"There is a vein of humour running through nearly the whole narrative which is delightful when caught. Though almost every chapter proves the writer to be a man of scientific taste and ability, the general reader will not find enough science to daunt him."—Spectator, 1x. 1187.

The preface states that its chief object is to examine, in such a way as a person without special technical knowledge may follow, the general elements of musical effect; and, by the light of that inquiry, to mark out clearly the position of music in relation to the faculties and feet; and, by the light of that inquiry, to mark out clearly the position of music in relation to the faculties and feet; and, by the light of that inquiry, to mark out clearly the position of music in relation to the faculties and feet; and, by the light of that inquiry, to mark out clearly the position of music in relation to the faculties and feet; and, by the light of that inquiry, to mark out clearly the position of music in relation to the faculties and feelings of the individual, to the other arts, and to society at large.' . .
